She straightway went in the blue room and turned down the covers of the big brass bed; then she said to Jimmy's father, "You may carry him in, if you please, and he shall wake up in the brass bed, and he shall sleep there now as long as he is willing to keep the room clean."

And next morning, to Jimmy's great delight, he opened his eyes in the big brass bed. The dear little fellow sleeps there to this day, except when there is company.—Exchange.

Little Mary came into the house bedraggled and weeping.

"My goodness," cried her mother; "what a sight you are! How did it happen?"

"I am sorry, mamma, but I fell into a mud puddle."

"What! with your best dress on?"

"Y-y-yes, I didn't have time to change it."—Central Wesleyan Star.

"Holding Our Ground."

There are only a few things in life which, when done, are done forever; and these things mostly belong to the disintegrating and destructive activities of the world. The tree lies as it falls. The destruction which scars and obliterates is final. Like the erosion of the wind on the rocks, there is no "come-back" to it. What was, is no more, nor shall be again.

But the things which have to do with life and growth and the continuity of worth are not done once and for all. A persistent repetition of healthy functioning is indispensable if life is to continue strong and fine; and it is both a warning and an encouragement to know that certain things have to be done over and over again if they are to be done as they ought to be done. It is a warning because we are apt to think that in our moral and religious discipline, especially, that ground once gained cannot be lost. And it is an encouragement, for a single lapse is likely to depress us unduly, as if everything had been lost.

History is full of testimony to the truth of this fact. Has it not cost us tears and blood to learn that liberty has to be maintained as well as gained? We struggle through a dark travail to win liberty and then discover that unless we extend its borders we jeopardize the freedom we have gained. It is never safe to assume that social or political freedom is absolutely secure, or that because liberty abounds in one corner of the earth that it will abound across the border-line, which separates us from another people. Freedom's continuance depends on her vigilance and continued self-protection. Indifference and lethargy give opportunity for the encroachments of the subtle bondage of political and social corruption.

This is just as true in religion. Faith has to be always on its guard. In St. Paul's letter to the Philippians he portrays "the peace of God" as a sentry keeping a keen eye on the enemy so that the heart of the believer shall not suffer from unseen onslaughts. Churches and individuals should beware of the delusion that liberty is won for them once for all time. It is a delusion which explains many a relapse into positions where "the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free" is compromised. Like the builders on the wall of Jerusalem in Nehemiah's day we should have our sword girded by our side while we wield the trowel; for the attack of the enemy never ceases, it merely shifts from one position to another.

And does not our personal religion find this to be true? "Son," says Thomas a Kempis, "thou canst not possess perfect freedom unless thou wholly renounce thyself." And then the grand old mystic makes the son reply to his Lord: "Lord, this is not the work of one day." Which is the thing we have been saying.

"Let no man think that sudden in a minute
All is accomplished and the work is done."

The higher levels of character and faith are not reached and kept by flashes of religious emotion. Our lower nature, "the body of this death," has a way of stealing back upon us and dragging us back to the old levels. The work of holding the gained ground needs to be done over and over again. Sheer etermination and prayer is the only thing that tells. The following of Jesus is not done in a minute; it is not the work of one day's sanguine enthusiasm. It is a daily devotion to the creation of habits of holiness and faith, and the making of a cast of mind which is "steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord."—M. J., in Wyoming Churchman.

If you are sure about anything, shun it. There is no true living without shrinking. Every Christian has a shrinking side to his life. There are some things he utterly loathes, is heartily and wholesomely afraid, cannot think of without a shudder. There is no fear but that this will come if you keep near Christ.—R. W. Barbour.

He Who Serves.

He has not served who gathers gold,
Nor has he served whose life is told
In selfish battles he has won,
Or deeds of skill that he has done,
But he has served who now and then
Has helped along his fellowmen.

The world needs many men today;
Red-blooded men along life's way,
With cheerful smiles and helping hands
And with the faith that understands
The beauty of the simple deed
Which serves another's hour of need.

Strong men to stand beside the weak,
Kind men to hear what others speak,
True men to keep our country's laws
And guard its honor and its cause;
Men who will bravely play life's game
Nor ask rewards or gold or fame.

Teach me to do the best I can
To help and cheer our fellowman;
Teach me to lose my selfish need
And glory in the larger deed
Which smooths the road and lights the day
For all who chance to come my way.
—Edward A. Guest, in "American Men."

A Positive Religion.

"From the first, Christianity has claimed to be the universal religion. It was destined from the first to embrace the whole world; it was to last throughout the ages. 'Go ye,' said its Founder, 'and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost'; and 'Loo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.'"

In this claim of universality, whether in time or range of empire, there lay the implied and further claim to be the absolute religion—the one final unveiling of the universal Father's mind before the eyes of His children. This conviction underlies St. Paul's earnest apostolate of the Gentiles in the fact of active Jewish prejudice.

He owed the absolute religion as he could have owed no relative religion whatever to the Greeks and to the Barbarians alike, to the philosophers and to the uneducated. To his eye, all the deepest divisions of country, race and station vanished entirely as men passed within the Church. "There is," he exclaimed, 'ine'ther Greek nor Jew, nor circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, but Christ is all and in all." A religion conscious of being suitable only to particular dates or localities could never have originally aspired to bring within the range of its influence all the varieties of race and thought that are found in the human family. It would feel its unsuitableness to some civilizations, to some historical periods, if not to all.

"To make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God," was an ambition appropriate "to the faith once for all delivered to the saints."

Many moral victories that we want to see won in the world can be won only when we are gone; but let us make our contribution, and others will carry on the struggle. Captain Urquhart, dying in the battle of Atbara, in the Soudan, said to the men who were attending him, "Never mind me, lads, go on!" Inspired with the work of the cause, and the importance of the army's victory, he could forget his pain and give up his life, and tell the others to go on. We have a more important battle to fight—we must carry on the war of God against all wrong—and every soldier that falls must inspire the others to go on.—T. R. Williams.

The Task of the Church.

The Church, if she is doing her full duty to the home, and thus to our State and nation, has the right and the privilege of saying, "Give us your children and, working together, we will teach them." Note the following summary of the work of the Church of the Atonement:

Teach them to know Jesus by means of Bible stories, Bible reading and Bible history.

Teach them to pray.

Teach them to worship in the regular church services.

Teach them to sing; to sing the great hymns of the Church and to understand what they sing. They memorize at least twenty-five hymns during the entire course.

Teach them the great festivals of the Church and their meaning.

Teach them to love their Church by learning her history.

Teach them to know what it means to be a Christian; and help them to practice that Christianity each day in their home, at their work and at their play.

Teach them how men and women have served others in the largest life by telling them the great missionary stories.

Teach them how they may read their Bible and thus know for themselves what the Bible teaches.

Teach them Bible verses, storing up God's promises which shall sustain them during temptations.

Teach them to appreciate the sermon by having oral and written reports of same.

Teach them to love their Church by making Church workers of them.

Teach them to love their parents and home because they have become intelligent Christians.—C. E. Frontz, in "Church School."

The Department of Personal Piety.

All campaigning and overhead organization implies faithfulness to that which is least in "that state of life unto which it shall please God to call" us. The department of "personal piety" of which each Church member is in great part his own chairman, must be back of every other centralized general movement. Missions, Social Service, Christian Education, Finance, Publicity—all must draw on that department for ultimate sources of spiritual and lasting power. The righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost that are the hiding of the Church's power must be available from the department of piety in the kingdom that cometh without observation, whatsoever be the functioning of its executive or business agencies. The cross, not the dollar mark, the seal of baptism, not the bulla of any signature of highly concentrated administration, is the outstanding symbol of all true Church success in all time.

They tell us in these days that there are great world questions of business credit disturbing the marts of the nations. Credit is belief in promises to pay. Is there not a deeper menace to our very Christianity in its exhibit not only of widespread default in paying Christian vows, but in treating them lightly, if not jauntily ignoring them altogether? A Christian's demoralizing loss of credit with himself in this spiritual respect is a species of bankruptcy which accounts for a good deal of the failure of civilization to accredit the Church at large. Poverty of piety is the worst starvation crisis of any age. —Bishop Nichols.

Helping by Prayer.

God has put it in our power to help each other in many ways; sometimes by deeds that lift away burdens, sometimes by words that inspire courage and strength, sometimes by sympathy that halves sorrow. But there is no other way in which we can serve others so wisely, so effectively, so divinely as by intercession for them. Our hands are clumsy and awkward, and ofttimes hurt the life we would heal with our touch, or strengthen or uphold with our strength; but in prayer we can reach our friend through God, and His hand is infinitely gentle and never hurts a life. We lack wisdom, and ofttimes the help we give is untimely or unwise. We lift away burdens that God wants our friend to carry. We make the way easy for him when God has made it hard for his own good, for the development of his powers. We save our friend from hardship or self-denial, or hold him back from perilous duty or exhausting service, when these are the very paths in which God would lead him—the paths to honor, to larger usefulness, to nobler life. Ofttimes our love is short-sighted. We think we are helping our friend, when really we are hindering him in the things that most deeply concern his life. But we can pray and ask God to help him, not in our way, but in His own way, and His help is never unwise nor untimely. He never lifts away a load which our friend will be the better for carrying. He never does things for him which he had better be left to do for himself, nor spares him hardness or suffering which will make him more a man.—Westminster Teacher.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Edward Harold Vogt, rector of Deer Creek Parish, Darlington, Md., has resigned to accept the rectorship of Trinity Church, Woodbridge, N. J., to take effefct October 1.

The Rev. D. Pierce-Jones has assumed charge at Park River, Langdon, and Laketam, N. D., with address at Park River.

The Rev. Dr. Leighton Williams, rector of St. John's Church, Kingston, N. Y., has accepted the call to Christ Church, Marlborough, N. Y., and takes charge about September 1.

The Very Rev. James G. Glass, dean of St. Luke's Cathedral, Orlando, Fla., should be addressed until October 1 at Sewanee, Tenn.

After September 1 the address of the Rev. Frank R. Jones is changed from Willard Parker Hospital, Fort East, Sixteenth Street, to St. Mary's rectory, 338 Alexander Avenue, New York City

The Rev. Eustace P. Ziegler has gone to Cordova, Alaska, for a term of four years, and should so be addressed.

The address of the Rev. Jesse R Bicknell is changed to 508 Park Avenue, Baltimore, Md.

The Rev. Charles W. Baxter, rector of St. Peter's Church, New Ulm, Minn., has accepted the rectorship of All Saints' Church, Valley City, N. D., and expects to take charge about October 1.

The Rev. Wythe Leigh Kinsolving has returned to Richmond, Va., after a summer trip to Italy, where he officiated in our churches in Florence and Rome.

The Rev. D. Wilmot Gateson, rector of Trinity Church, Williamsport, Pa., will preach at St. Peter's by the Sea, Galilee, on the New Jersey Coast, below the Highlands, Sunday, August 28.

The Rev. Philip Sidney Irwin, resigning as Archdeacon of the colored work on the east coast of Southern Florida, is in charge of work at Trinity Church, Bridgeport, Conn.

Ordinations.

On Friday, August 12, the Bishop of the Diocese of Easton ordained to the diaconate the Rev. Rubert B. Matthews, many years a Congregationalist preacher. The Rev. Mr. Matthews has been serving the Diocese faithfully as a lay reader, taking work wherever needed. The service of ordination was held in Trinity Cathedral, Easton, after Morning Prayer had been said by the Rev. Samuel Borden-Smith. The Bishop was assisted in the service by the Rev. Dr. Sutton, the Rev. Mr. Davies and the Rev. Dr. Archbold. Sixteen clergymen were present. The Rev. Mr. Matthews will serve for the present at Trappe, the parish from which the Rev. Samuel Borden-Smith recently resigned.

Deaths.

The Rev. T. J. O. Curran, rector of St. Peter's Church, San Pedro, Cal., died of pneumonia following bronchitis on Sunday, July 17. Funeral services were held from the church on Thursday, July 21, and interment was in Inglewood Cemetery.

The Abundant Life.

That the love of pleasure is one of the chief enemies of an unselfish life is a commonplace of experience. We all wish to be happy, and we are not wrong in wishing it. "A happy man or woman," says Robert Louis Stevenson, "is a better thing to find than a five-pound note. He or she is a radiating focus of good will, and their entrance into a room is as though another candle had been lighted." But what makes life really happy? Let us consider a few of the elements, distinctly, not selfish, which we at once recognize as necessary to abiding happiness.

Friends are necessary to a happy life. When friendship deserts us we are as lonely and helpless as a ship, left by the tide here upon the shore; when friendship returns to us, it is as though the tide came back, gave us buoyancy and freedom, and opened to us the wide places of the world. Proteus in "Two Gentlemen of Verona" says: "I to myself am dearer than a friend." How clearly such a man has blocked from his life one of the great avenues of happiness! But friendship is essentially unselfish; its proper voice is heard in such words as Jesus spoke to his disciplees that last night at the table.

One of Paul's most engaging qualities was his sturdy self-respect, his love of economic independence, his pride in his handicraft. Honest and useful work in self-support, with something left over with which to help others, was necessary to his happiness. "Let him that stole steal no more," he wrote to the Ephesians, "but rather let him labor, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth." Any normal man understands Paul's feeling in this respect. Idleness is the most deadly boredom that life can know, and hard work, honestly done, with just pride in efficiency and skill, is life's fundamental blessing. Deprive us of it for many months and we are restless, unsatisfied and unhappy as a homesick boy away from his own household. But good work is self-expenditure; it is the forth-putting of personality in creative labor. Manifestly, happiness has in it requirements of self-investment as well as self-regard.

Of course Paul wished to see Rome. Paul was an imperial man and Rome was the imperial city. Paul's happiness consisted in part in this very fact, that he had large interests, and was not shut up to provincial enthusiasms. Wherever good and evil meet in combat, wherever great business was afoot, wherever Christ was building up His church, Paul's heart was engaged. How much of happiness depends upon such breadth of interest!

The Master's earnest desire was to share with His disciples the best blessings He had. His peace, His love, His joy—He did not wish to keep them to Himself. And undoubtedly the more He shared, the more He possessed, for spiritual goods always multiply by division. Are we not facing here a basic truth in our lives? Before we can fully enjoy anything we must share it. Even a good book, good music, beautiful scenery—anything is enjoyed the more when we divide with others the experience. But this perquisite for full happiness is distinctly unselfish. No man can achieve this special brand of abiding satisfaction by any manipulating of self-regard alone.

"All who joy would win must share it. Happiness was born a twin."

Here surely was a source of happiness in Paul's life, without which he would have been utterly bereft; he had spiritual resources within him on which even in his Roman prison he could fall back for recreation and refreshment. Sooner or later all men come to the need of such inner wells of living water. Trouble falls upon us, and by it we are driven in upon ourselves. The days arrive when happiness cannot spring from outward circumstance; we must discover it within, and carry it with us amid forbidding conditions. But a selfish man never can find such sources of joy within himself. Pascal was right: "The man who lives only for himself hates nothing so much as being alone with himself." A life inwardly rich and resourceful must be, as Paul prayed, "rooted and grounded in love." Alas! for a man thrown back by fickle fortune on himself, who discovers in his own narrow cupboard nothing to live on except the resentments, the irritabilities, the peevish disappointed ambitions of a selfish heart!

In these farewell words of Paul there is the unmistakable accent of a victorious and joyful spirit. And this is the secret of his joy: he hae lived his life for a cause that is worth living and dying for. The deep satisfactions of a purposeful existence, dedicated to a worthy end, remain with him to death. His final note is that of a happy warrior: "I have fought hte good fight." Compare with this the retrospect of a self-centered frittered life! The selfish man may have been carnal, deserving Carlyle's terrific comment on the eighteenth century. "Soul extinct; stomach well alive!" He may have been cruel, like Milton's "Sons of Belial, flown with insolence and wine." But in any case he has missed the supreme satisfaction of life. "This is now to be said," wrote Alfred the Great, "that whilst I live I wish to live nobly, and after life to leave to the men who come after me the memory of good works."

Is it not plain from this study that he who seeks for happiness without unselfishness has missed his road? Friends, useful work, expanded interests, the delights of shared experience, inward spiritual resources and a worthy purpose at life's center—such unselfish things as these are the very substance of a joyful and abundant life.—Harry Emerson Fosdick, in The Meaning of Service.

As a well-known London clergyman was ascending the steps to his church, an old lady requested his help. With his usual courtly grace he gave the old woman his arm. On reaching the top step she halted breathlessly and asked him who was to preach.

"The Rev. Mr. ——," he replied, giving his own name.

"Oh, dear," she exclaimed, "help me down again! I'd rather listen to the endless grinding of a windmill. Help me down again; I'll not go in."

The minister smiled, and gently assisted her down, remarking, as he parted with her, "I wouldn't go in either if I weren't the preacher."—English Paper.

Bishop C. P. McIlvaine

The Church is a great missionary association, divinely constituted, for the special work of sending into all the world the ministers and missionaries of the Word. But if such be the cardinal object of the whole Church, it must be alike the cardinal object and duty of every part of that Church, so that whether a section thereof be situated in America or in Europe, or the remotest latitudes of Africa, it is alike required to attempt the enlightening of all the earth, and though it be the smallest of the local divisions of the Christian household, and though just on its narrow boundaries there may be millions of neglected pagans swarming with the horrors of heathenism, still that little section of the Church is to embrace within the circle of its zeal, if not of its immediate labors, the destitute of all the earth.

From Bishop McIlvaine's address to the General Convention of 1835.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The Lord's day is not rightly observed in the home where the children dislike the coming of Sunday.

There are people in every church who are as much dissatisfied with Christ as were the Scribes and Pharisees.

God has never made a man who could please everybody.

We often pray for faith to remove mountains, when what we need is light to see that they should remain right where they are.—Ex.

To teach the children anything we must know many things. We can't talk God's Word until we let God's Word talk to us.

Faith is more than a mental decision; it is a surrender of the will. It is more than a verdict; it is the execution of the verdict.—Jowett.

THE MISSIONARY SOCIETY CENTENNIAL

The Presiding Bishop and Council are asking the Church to join with them this fall in celebrating the Centennial of our old Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society. An attempt had been made to form this Society at the General Convention of 1820, and a crude and impossible constitution for its government had been approved; but on the last day of the session the election of Trustees for its management was so bungled that this body found itself unable to function, even in behalf of a Society "existing in idea only." At a special Convention held in October-November, 1821, a new and workable constitution was adopted and the Society was able to organize and begin operations. After the fashion of that day its membership consisted of contributors to its funds, divided into Patrons, Life Members and Annual Members, though its control was vested in the Bishops and a Board chosen by the Convention. It was not until fourteen years later that the principle was recognized that the Church itself was a Missionary Society by virtue of its divine charter, and the Society was declared to comprehend "all persons who are members of this Church."

A review of the work of this Society for the past century will therefore be a partial retrospect of the fidelity and efficiency of this Church during the same period, at least in one aspect of its life. As such it will yield us little occasion for pride or vain boasting. Cause will be shown for profound thankfulness to God for what He has wrought, sometimes, as it would seem, despite the stupidity or the lukewarmness of His people; for the men of broad vision and simple faith that in each generation He has given to be leaders and commanders; for the faithful, steadfast, untrumpeted work of a multitude of devoted missionaries in obscure fields; for the planting of the Church, however sparsely, throughout this and in other lands; for the higher ideals of service with which, from time to time, He has inspired His Church. "Not unto us, O Lord, but unto Thy Name give the praise" But for the Church in her membership, deep searchings of heart for neglected opportunities, for the Lord's portion withheld, for sloth and indifference, for self-seeking and pride of opinion, for the little return for the manifold grace!

In a spirit of humility and of hopefulness, therefore, it becomes the Church to mark this anniversary; to learn from the experiences of the past the sources both of her strength and her weakness; to mark where and why she has succeeded or failed; whether she has always put first things first and concentrated upon the fundamentals upon which the Kingdom of God must be built; wherein she hath need of a larger spirit of unselfishness, a more generous outlook upon the things of others, a closer study of and a deeper loyalty to the mind of Christ as revealed in His holy word and in the tokens of His providence. So will He send her forth with renewed vigor and grace to new missions of conquest and dominion for and in Him! G.

WHAT DOES A MISSIONARY CENTENNIAL MEAN TO YOU?

This week we are all thinking especially of the fact that the organized efforts of our Church in mission work have been going on for one hundred years.

Naturally, it is a time of retrospect, of the counting of achievements and noting the progress that has been made.

As one looks back to 1821 and notes the unbelievable changes that have taken place in the material world in this century and contrasts it with the slow, almost snail-like progress made in spiritual matters, it is almost depressing.

A hundred years ago men traveled, lived and transferred their ideas in practically the same way that they had been doing since the days of our Saviour and a few centuries before.

Just about this time in the last century God began to open for us His volumes of wonderful and evolutionizing information. First He divulged the hidden powers of steam, then came the opening of the marvelous properties of electricity, and later the wonders of the strength of the explosive powers of gasoline, ushering in horseless vehicles and leading to the conquest of the air by flying men.

Too often these things are thought of entirely as man's achievements, without realizing that it has all come to pass through the release of greater knowledge by our heavenly Father.

The thought that we must not lose sight of is that these wonderful changes and powers bring with them new responsibilities. God has allowed His secrets to be opened because He thought that we had sufficiently developed spiritually to use them aright. Are we disappointing Him? Are we availing ourselves of every modern device to carry forward His work, to spread the great message of the love He has for the world, and the way He demonstrated it by allowing His Son to come to us to set us the example of a perfect life here, and bring us the glad tidings of eternal life hereafter?

Today we enjoy many blessings denied to our ancestors, but we must not lose sight of the responsibilities that come with them.

In counting the accomplishments of our Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, it is not to be forgotten that this great organization is made up of individuals, and that each Christian has a separate and distinct life to lead, and an account of his own to render to God.

What are your personal missionary conquests? How many people have you brought to Christ? Not through your giving to the cause, but through your own efforts? These are some of the questions we should pause to ask ourselves on this occasion of our missionary centennial.

Of course no one can answer such questions fully, because no one can tell the influence that he wields. Some word of encouragement spoken long ago, and now forgotten, may have given just the needed hope and inspiration to a struggling soul at a critical moment, and this very fact should make us, as Christian men and women, remember that we are never free from our responsibility to our beloved Leader; that it is not just our conduct at church or Sunday school that is the important thing, but our daily life hour by hour that others watch to see whether Christianity is something that is really worth the having.

If we have God's love in our hearts, as we should do, to an extent that "we show it forth not only with our lips, but in our lives," then we are unconscious missionaries all the time.

Let our missionary centennial be a real taking stock of our spiritual possessions, assets and liabilities, and in that way it can be an inestimable benefit to our dear old Church and to us, its "members incorporate." M.

CHRISTIAN ATTITUDE TOWARD LABOR

Sinec Labor Day has become a national occasion, it behooves Christian people to pause and consider whether such a day has any special significance for our Church life of today.

The Federal Council of Churches of America has taken the position that the Christian people should give special attention to this day, and there are some Scriptural reasons for that attitude that are worthy of thoughtful attention.

Our Saviour was undoubtedly a manual laborer Himself. There can be no question but that He worked at Joseph's trade of carpentry for many years, a good many more years than were taken for His public ministry. It is true that the Bible maintains an absolute silence on that period from His attendance at the Passover Feast at Jerusalem to His baptism by John in the Jordan; nevertheless, there they are for us to speculate about.

There is one verse that covers fifteen years of time in our Saviour's life, and that one sentence is, "And Jesus increased in wisdom and in stature, and in favour with God and man." We are bound to believe that the increase "in stature and in favor with God and man" must have been developed at a carpenter's bench while He was laboring, first under Joseph's instruction and later probably to support His younger brothers and sisters.

This fact in itself should make us feel that our Lord, if alive today, would have been at least sympathetic toward the efforts of the laboring man to better his condition.

This period of our Lord's life, however, is by no means the only claim that labor has to the interest of the Christian Church.

When Christ undertook His great mission of presenting the kingdom of God, He chose and sent forth day laborers, who were accustomed to the hardships and privations of the life of the workman, to carry His great message. Those three disciples who composed that little inner circle, Peter, James and John, were all of this class. In spite of their roughness and probable ignorance, they were the ones who shared in such great spiritual wonders as the Transfiguration and the healing miracles. Indeed, the last scene which is presented to us in the gospels shows these workmen again at their tasks on the Galilean Lake and the Saviour's sympathy in the physical fatigue and mental depression of the poorly paid laborer, and there is no more beautiful occasion recorded in the gospels than that given us in the last chapter of St. John's record where we see the risen Saviour making provision for the physical needs of His discouraged and tired friends.

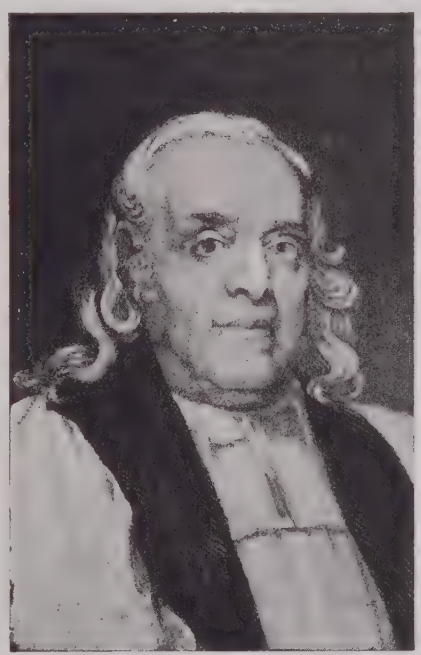
Nor does the claim of interest in the manual worker cease with the conclusion of the account of our Saviour's life and deeds. When we come to the Acts and the Epistles we find that St. Paul was a tentmaker by trade, and that he invariably supported himself by the work of his hands, referring with genuine pride to his ability to do so on more than one occasion. In these days of cultured Christianity, when the ministers and Church leaders represent the best educated and most refined people, it is well for us to look back at these rough rocks from whence we were hewn, so that we shall not forget that beyond all doubt our Saviour's interest would have been intense and sympathetic with every movement for the betterment of the life of the workingman.

The present situation in the industrial world is one that is peculiarly appealing to Christian hearts. In the early days of Bible times we continually read of those recurring famines when "there was no food in the land." Modern conditions have so transformed our relations with the soil that situations no longer arise when food cannot be obtained. Today it is not the actual sustenance that is difficult to secure, but the price of it. Instead of periodic scarcities of food we have ever returning times of shortage of work, so that the most industrious cannot find the opportunity to sell his labor. So far no effective remedy has been discovered for those conditions which transform honest workmen into vagrant beggars, wandering from place to place seeking, with ever accumulating discouragement, to find a means to earn an honest living, until force of circumstances drives them to some deed of depredation, which will give them food and lodging at least in a city or county jail.

According to government estimates today, more than 5,000,000 men are now out of work in the United States, and the situation is so serious that a conference has been called by the President to meet in Washington this month, at which the Secretaries of Labor and the Interior Departments will assist in trying to devise some means for the relief of the present conditions. When we stop to remember that most unemployed men have from two to five persons dependent upon him; it gives us an idea of the importance of finding some satisfactory solution for the present situation, and adds weight to the words of Secretary Hoover when he says, in connection with this conference:

"While the business situation is steadily improving, yet some sections of the workers may have exhausted their savings by the coming winter, and there must be a matter of extreme solicitude.

"It is inconceivable that America, with its surplus in food and clothing, with housing—though crowded—and with an abundance of fuel, could allow any suffering amongst those of our own people who desire to work. It is necessary that we should be forehanded in the preparation of such measures as will prevent any such suffering."



M.

EARLY MISSIONARY ACTIVITIES IN THE SOUTH

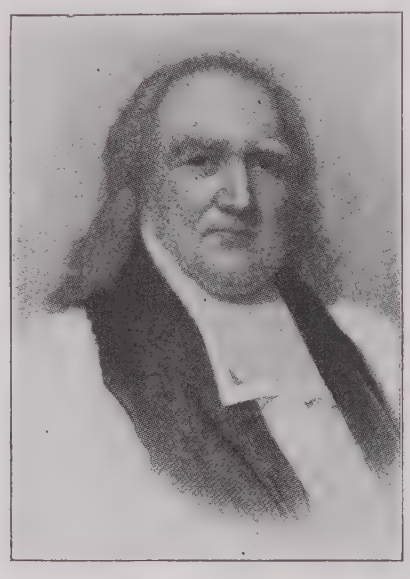
The South Atlantic States figure largely in the history of the American Church, and particularly in those chapters which tell of the beginnings and progress of her missionary development. It was here that English civilization first gained a permanent footing on American soil, and here that such American institutions as representative government and religious liberty had their birth. It was here that this Church was first planted, and with a distinctly declared purpose, by God's blessing, of bringing the knowledge of God to the heathen people of the land, which purpose was not forgotten in after days. It was here that, in securing the consecration of Bishop Madison and then of Bishop Claggett, the Episcopate was securely established and the union between the Church in New England and that in the Middle and Southern States was consummated and sealed. And here, too, the missionary idea was early implanted and bore fruit in the recovery of the Church from the lethargy and disasters which preceded and followed the Revolution and in her subsequent activities in the extension of her spiritual domain.

Generous praise has of late been accorded to the dioceses in this section for the readiness with which they undertook and the zeal with which they carried through the initial program of the Nation-Wide Campaign. It cannot fail to be recognized that this was due, not to a sporadic enthusiasm, but to the continued authority of those old and accepted traditions received from their fathers and their inheritance of that active missionary spirit which characterized the founders or rebuilders of the Church in these States. Little public record remains of the beginnings of missionary enterprise among them or of the earliest efforts for Church extension which persisted through the formative period of their history. Enough is known, however, if read with a sympathetic imagination, to demonstrate how thoroughly the nursing fathers of the Church in the Southern States were imbued with an invincible missionary enthusiasm and purpose, and how it was instilled into the minds of their people as a necessary corollary of the gospel which they received.

Bishop Claggett.

Something was due, doubtless, to the fact that from its foundation here this had been the Established Church, charged, therefore, with the obligation of caring for the religious needs of the whole population. However imperfectly this duty had been fulfilled, and whatever adversities she had since suffered by reason of her former connection with a hated and discarded system of government, this sentiment of responsibility survived. When her fortunes were at their lowest ebb, and a tidal wave of infidelity and irreligion was sweeping the country, her hopes of recovery were largely tinctured with a sense of religious obligation to the young republic to whose foundation she had so greatly contributed. No sooner had she gathered here and there a little strength, and long before her sons could seemingly be spared from the task of rebuilding her waste places, she was actively interested in extending her borders and following her children into the regions of the west. Her duty in this regard was recognized from the beginning and was undertaken, with little system or efficiency, indeed, but possibly with more sincerity than has been supposed. Missionary activity in those days was largely of the nature of private enterprise. No "reports" would be made of it unless in personal letters, and frequently, of course, no tangible results would follow by which it could be traced in later times. But certain it is that years before the creation of missionary societies, general or diocesan, the struggling Church, crippled and disorganized as she was, was slowly reaching out from the seaboard to the mountains, and over the mountains into new territories, impelled by a missionary instinct which was a strong characteristic of her renewed life.

Even in Colonial days clergymen from the southern colonies were found as far southwest as Florida and Alabama, and also in Kentucky and Illinois, then remote and unorganized portions of Virginia. The Rev. Alexander Balmaine, of honored memory, had penetrated Southwest Virginia certainly as far as Wythe, and is said to have visited Pittsburgh; and doubtless others, by whatever motive led, had explored the western wilds with the earlier pioneers, and perhaps remained there, leaving no records behind.



Bishop Madison (1790-1812) was the first Southern Bishop, and no American Bishop has been more misrepresented by our Church historians, few of whom have even attempted to know his work or to do him justice. He was a survival of the best type of the colonial Churchmen of the pre-Revolutionary period. So, indeed, were his contemporary Bishops, but Bishop Madison, with his Diocese, was far more entangled in the cerements of a dead era than any or all of these. But he knew his Diocese thoroughly, not only the old tidewater parishes, but the western wilderness as well, and labored for it unremittingly. His visitations were frequent and laborious. His pastoral addresses were flaming appeals for ever renewed fidelity and zeal. He urged every expedient for keeping the Church alive, in the face of the most vindictive social and political forces avowedly bent upon her complete extinction. For in the eyes of a triumphant and undisciplined democracy in this State the Church was wholly identified with a hidebound and oppressive religious establishment which had outlived its usefulness by two generations and was now properly dead, but which they intended to see buried beyond the possibility of resurrection. Of the clergy who survived the Revolution few were men of intellectual force or physical vigor, and those who were added to their number by ordination or removal from other States brought to them little, either of weight or character. The exceptions formed a much smaller body of the younger clergy, mostly native Virginians, thoroughly loyal both to the old Church and to the new republic, but whose ecclesiastical traditions, with their orders, had been chiefly derived from the Church of England at the period of her deepest spiritual lethargy. With these Bishop Madison continued to struggle for the Church's right to exist until too enfeebled to do more. His last plea to his convention, now too few to muster a quorum except by his beseeching effort, was for an Assistant Bishop to carry on a work too heavy for his failing strength; and the last constructive act of that convention was to attempt to provide for itinerant missionaries to carry the ministrations of the Church to her waste places. Neither purpose could be accomplished. The old order must needs pass away to make room for a new. The Church survived chiefly in the homes of her faithful members, now mainly reduced to poverty, where the Prayer Book was taught beside the family altar. But even in these troubled times of transition a strong missionary spirit, so foreign to, and almost interdicted by, the later colonial Church, is seen coming slowly into being, to become the strength and glory of the revived Church which should arise from the ruins of the old.

The Church in Maryland, which had been less closely bound to the civil government in colonial times and had been bred in a more tolerant atmosphere, though greatly weakened during the Revolutionary era, suffered the loss of neither her property nor her prestige. To that Diocese seems to belong the honor of sending officially the first missionaries beyond her borders. The General Convention of 1792 had passed an act providing that collections be made in the several dioceses for the support of missionaries on the frontier, to be sent to Bishop White and a central committee appointed to receive and appropriate the same. The plan proved fruitless, and at the next convention the committee was dissolved and the collections made were returned to the dioceses from which they came with the advice that the Church in each State should send out missionaries under its own appointment and supervision. Acting under this plan, Bishop Claggett employed first the Rev. Edward Gannt and then the Rev. Samuel Keene as missionaries to Kentucky, then a newly erected State. The former was compelled to return almost immediately on account of ill health, and for the same reason the stay of the latter was short, though not unfruitful. The Rev. William Kavenaugh, a popular Methodist minister, was brought by his influence to take orders at the hands of Bishop Claggett, as Dr. James Moore, of Lexington, a Presbyterian, president of Transylvania University and the gentle hero of James Lane Allen's story, "Flute and Violin," had previously received them from Bishop Madison. Several congregations were organized and asked Bishop Claggett to assume their Episcopal oversight. The Church in that State owed much to his continued interest and efforts in their behalf, though he was never able to visit them.

To Maryland also the Church in Virginia was not a little indebted for influences leading to her resurrection. William Meade studied theology and practical Christianity in the home of one of her honored presbyters. She gave to Alexandria two young clergymen, William H. Wilmer and Oliver Norris, who, next to Meade and, of course, Bishop Moore, were most instrumental in the revival of the Diocese; and from her Virginia borrowed her canons on Church discipline so needed for the inculcation of higher ideals of Christian living.

The story of the revival of the Virginia Church, as a new generation arose to espouse her cause, needs not to be retold except to note how it was due, under God, to a spirit of missionary zeal and effort which has seldom been surpassed since Apostolic times. The whole State was but a missionary field; it swestern half a sparsely settled wilderness, its older portions occupied by almost extinct parishes with but here and there a flickering flame arising from their decaying altars. Under the leadership of Bishop Moore a little band of younger clergy began the work of rebuilding and, as soon as possible, of enlarging her borders. Their numbers quite rapidly increased by the accession of others of like mind. Every minister was a missionary in the regious round about him, and every exhortation in their wide journeyings sought to arouse a like spirit in others. After the crude fashion of the time missionary societies were formed in every parish to aid in Church extension, in the education of young men for the ministry or for the circulation of the Scriptures and religious literature; and out of her poverty, for the Church in Virginia was poor in worldly goods, she learned to abound to the riches of her liberality. In half a generation a strong diocese had sprung up from the ashes of the old and had already become a source of ministerial supply to the South and West.

In North Carolina the Church was established in but few places in the eastern parts before the Revolution, and was little known elsewhere. An effort for its organization as a diocese was early made, and in 1795 five clergymen and eight laymen signed the testimonials of the Rev. Charles Pettigrew as their Bishop-elect. He was prevented by an epidemic from reaching the General Convention of that year for consecration, and died soon after. The few ministers remaining in the State died or were scattered, and not for twenty years could the effort be successfully renewed. In the spring of 1819 Bishop Moore visited the State, confirmed several hundred persons at six different points, and reported that the Church was "rising in all the vigor of youth." He ordained several men, and upon repeating his visit two years later was again greatly encouraged. In 1823 the Rev. John S. Ravenscroft, of Mecklenburg County, Va., upon their own borders, was consecrated the first Bishop of North Carolina. He was a man full of force and earnestness, and under his administration the Church showed great vitality and, without outside aid, was gradually extended throughout the State. Bishop Ravenscroft, as did Bishop Meade soon after, made an extensive tour through Tennessee and Kentucky and largely aided in the formation of those dioceses.

In South Carolina the organization and thorough revival of the Church was again hindered by prejudice and misunderstanding arising largely from its previous connection with the civil power and the popular revolt against all supposedly English institutions. Dr. Smith, her first Bishop, reluctantly received as such, lived but six years after his consecration, and his successor was not chosen until eleven year later. Under Bishop Dehon, however, and the strong line of Bishops who followed him, the Church grew strong and virile in the older parts of the State and gradually possessed the upper country. Her clergy were men of marked character, drawn from the most influential families of the State and zealous in good works, and she sent many of her sons into the newer dioceses of the South to be strongly instrumental in their upbuilding. To missions far beyond her own borders she contributed largely both of men and means. Moreover, she did not neglect a missionary field immediately at her doors. and nowhere in the South was such faithful and fruitful attention paid to the religious training of the slave population, so much so that her negro membership came eventually to outnumber the whites.

South Carolina became also the foster-mother of the Church in Georgia, which had been but feebly established in the neighborhood of Savannah before the Revolution and was almost extinguished at its close. Its rise was slow, not from lack of devotion on the part of its members, but, as throughout the South, then and since, from lack of clergymen to take advantage of its opportunities. Bishops Smith, Dehon and Bowen, of South Carolina, regularly visited the congregations in Georgia, and when its convention was organized in 1823 the Diocese was placed under the charge of the latter and so remained until his death. Finally South Carolina gave to Georgia her first Bishop, in 1841, in the person of the saintly Stephen Elliott, under whom the Church grew steadily, although the ground was already so largely ococupied by other religious communions.

Bishop Elliott, in turn, had charge for ten years of the Church in Florida. Work was begun in this State to a limited extent almost immediately after its session by Spain to the United States in 1821, and again it was South Carolina who sent the first missionaries there and her Bishop to visit them. Florida, however, was early adopted as a field of operations by the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, which sent there its first missionaries, with one exception, who labored in the South, and continued its aid to the Diocese, organized in 1838, for many years thereafter.

But in the other States which we have mentioned the growth of the Church was to be attributed, as we have seen, to a strong missionary energy developed within these dioceses themselves. It is this that has made them vigorous in their own life, multiplying their numbers and sending out help and power to other parts. Perhaps they have been fortunate in having little outside aid to lean upon. Certainly they are so in their inherited traditions. Missionary societies and all the machinery of Church extension that is useful came into being as the expression and the vehicle of a missionary purpose already born and active, and so alone can they continue to function. They are invaluable auxiliaries, but not the main essential, which lies deep in the inner life of the Church and manifests itself by its fruits.

NOT PEACE, BUT A SWORD.

Christ's statement that He had come to bring strife and a sword on earth did not mean that He wished any such results to accompany His coming and His work, but that results were inevitable. Christ sets up a standard that arouses the antagonism of evil-minded men. He tells people to be unselfish, helpful, self-sacrificing, and because people are naturally greedy and selfish and self-seeking, they not only refuse to accept His standards, but oppose and attack those who do not wish to be just and right, and whose self-interests will be injured by the triumph of righteousness. Christ has come to bring peace, but before peace can reign wrong must be overthrown, and wrong cannot be overthrown without a struggle.—Christian Herald.

GOD'S MOVEMENTS NOT AIMLESS.

Have faith! where'er thy bark is driven—
The calm's disport, the tempest's mirth—
Know this! God rules the host of heaven,
The inhabitants of earth.

JAPAN, SIXTY YEARS AGO AND NOW

In the divine and merciful working out of the decree of the Almighty, it may come to pass that in this year of the Centenary of the Missionary Society of the Church the forward steps shall be taken which will lead to a long and lasting peace on earth through the Disarmament Conference the President has called to meet at Washington. Certainly there is a significance for Churchmen in the fact that the conference has been called to meet this year; that of the three leading States participating in the conference—the United States, Great Britain and Japan—the two former are strongly impregnated with the doctrines of the Protestant Episcopal Church; while of the third, Japan, there is broad significance for Churchmen in the fact that within the compass of the one hundred years of the life of the Missionary Society, the kingdom was opened up to civilization by a Churchman, Commodore Perry; that the first Christian service celebrated thereafter on its soil was promoted by a Churchman, Townsend Harris, first American Minister to Japan, and conducted by another Churchman; and finally, that the first Christian missionaries sent into the country were representatives of that Missionary Society whose anniversary we are now celebrating.

Surely it would be a triumph over which the whole world could rejoice, if in this centennial year of the Missionary Society the peace of the world should be assured!

Perry dropped anchor in Yeddo Bay, July 8, 1853. He was himself a Churchman, and there is authentic record that a service was read from the Book of Common Prayer on the deck of his flagship while it lay in Japanese waters. But it was not until five years later that the first Christian service was actually held on Japanese soil. Eight months after his arrival the first American treaty with Japan was concluded, under which two ports were opened to American trade. Then, in 1858, Townsend Harris, of New York, the first American Minister to Japan, and also a communicant of the Church, took up the work of negotiating a more comprehensive treaty.

Up to this time Christianity was under a ban in the kingdom. Preaching was forbidden, and any one suspected of being a Christian was put under arrest. A penalty of death was prescribed against any Japanese embracing the faith.

July 29, 1858, Harris concluded a second treaty, under which six more posts were opened up to American trade; and the Americans were granted protection in the practice of their religious beliefs. Then it was that the first Christian service was held on Japanese soil. The service was conducted in the home of Minister Harris in Nagasaki—a house which had formerly been a Buddhist temple. Idols of the heathen god still stood outside the portals. Within were many of the old images of the Buddha. Rev. Henry Wood, chaplain of the warship Powhatan, of Commodore Perry's fleet, conducted the service.

Within a year the Rev. J. Liggins and Rev. C. M. Williams, later Bishop of Yeddo, arrived to represent the Missionary Society of the Church. They were the first Christian missionaries to enter the kingdom.

Sixty-three years have elapsed since then, and the Church has made marked progress in Japan. Japan has given encouragement to those who preach the Christian doctrine, and has herself advanced to the front rank of the nations. What a strange working out of destiny it will be if, in the centennial year of the Missionary Society, the two nations shall agree that the warship which carried the seeds of civilization to the Far East has, by reason of the progress of that civilization, outlived the period of its usefulness!

The Church in Japan has now, roughly, the same number of bishops and about half the same number of clergy that the Church in the United States had one hundred years ago.

With six bishops—all foreign—fifty-six foreign clergy, one hundred and forty-five native clergy (forty-five of them deacons) and nearly 12,000 communicants, it is a definite working Church. It may be remembered that Bishop Whipple described his small traveling party as a "working church" when he had only "one bishop, one priest, one deacon, one white and two native Christian laymen—and the heathen to be converted." Compared with this necessary minimum, the Church in Japan is tremendous.

There are 28,000 baptized persons, 1,400 of them baptized during the last year reported, 1920. Confirmations numbered eight hundred and fifty-seven.

Among the buildings there are one hundred and twenty-seven churches, about half of them consecrated; eighty-four mission halls, two hospitals, two dispensaries, five orphanages with about two hundred children. There are seventy boarding and day schools, fifty of them in Tokyo and Kyoto.

The contributions from the churches during the year 1920 were about $70,000. There was a marked increase in the contributions per capita from 1919 to 1920. Counting only those who communicated during the year, the per capita contributions for three years, 1918-19-20, were $5, $5.50 and $9.

That no one may conclude the time has arrived for foreigners to withdraw and let the Nippon Seikokwai make its way unaided, it must be remembered that the population of Japan is about 77,000,000.

The Arrival of Commodore Perry in Japan.

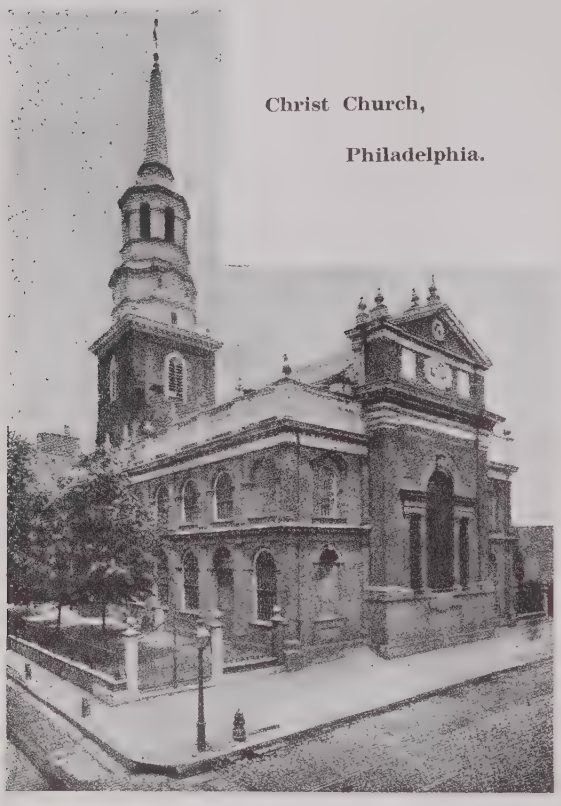
In looking into the future as we celebrate our Centennial, think of these statements recently published in the Missionary Outlook:

The 80,000,000 people of Central Africa are still pagan.

60,000,000 or 80,000,000 boys and girls of school age in China are growing up with limited educational advantages.

More than 99 per cent. of the college students in South America profess no belief in God.

Ninety-nine per cent. of the women of India may be classed as illiterates.



One-half of the world's 600,000,000 boys and girls under fifteen cannot read or write in any language, are ignorant of Jesus Christ, never have had a Christian home.—St. Andrew's Cross.

Just to give up, and trust
All to a fate unknown,
Plodding along life's road in the dust,
Bounded by walls of stone;
Never to have a heart at peace;
Never to see when care will cease;
Just to be still when sorrows fall—
This is the bitterest lesson of all.

Just to give up, and rest
All on a Love secure,
Out of a world that is hard at the best,
Looking to heaven as sure;
Ever to hope, through cloud and fear,
In darkest night, that the dawn is near;
Just to wait at the Master's feet—
Surely now the bitter is sweet.

—Henry Van Dyke.

THE CHURCH AND THE REPUBLIC

Christ Church,

Philadelphia.

Not as a Church anniversary only, but as a truly national event may we justly regard the Centenary of the Missionary Society which the Church is celebrating this year.

It is both interesting and profitable to recall, for instance, that the Constitution of the Church in practically every detail parallels the Constitution of the United States; and that, in large measure, the same men who framed the one drafted the other.

Note, in this connection, that Bishop William White, father of the Church in the United States, and one of the founders of the Missionary Society, was chaplain of the Continental Congress; and, when the young government had finally been put upon a firm constitutional basis, the same Bishop White was one of the first chaplains of the new Federal Congress.

Those were brave days in the history of both Church and State when President Washington and his wife worshipped in old Christ Church, Philadelphia, where Chaplain White preached. Benjamin Franklin was a vestryman there, and included in the congregation were such men as Adams, Hamilton, Dickinson, Madison, Jay, Morris, Randolph and scores of others, only less notable.

These are details to be remembered in this anniversary year of the Missionary Society, for inasmuch as the whole Church is the Missionary Society and every baptized communicant a member, the histories of both interlock.

Going back a step to the days when the republic was but struggling to its feet, we find that also included among the communicants of Christ Church was Dame Betsy Ross, who made the first Stars and Stripes; and following along then down to 1821, the year in which the Missionary Society sprang into existence, Francis Scott Key, author of "The Star Spangled Banner," and a Maryland member of the Church, is found to have been a member of the committee which drafted the Constitution of the society. So, too, Joseph Hopkinson, author of "Hail, Columbia," was a communicant of Christ Church. Scores of these charming memories af the early days of the Church in the United States might be recalled.

THE NIGHT BEFORE CHRISTMAS

Millions of children all over the land have been thrilled by the recital of that Yuletide classic, "'Twas the Night Before Christmas." How many know who wrote it, or where it was written? Its author was Dr. Clement C. Moore, and he was the son of Rt. Rev. Benjamin Moore, D. D., second Bishop of New York; it was written in Old Chelsea House, home of the Bishop, which stood on a hill near what is now Twenty-third Street and Ninth Avenue, New York City. Dr. Moore donated to the Church the land on which the General Theological Seminary now stands in New York. In the refectory of the Seminary his portrait hangs; and on the "night before Christmas" of each succeeding year the students at the Seminary twine evergreens around it in memory of this Churchman who has carried happiness into the hearts of countless generations of little ones.

Dr. Clement C. Moore.

THE EARTH THAT IS TO BE.

Rev. Frederick W. Neve.

My soul, my soul, it cannot rest,
I venture forth upon my quest,
Because, so far, it fails to see
The golden earth that is to be.

A dreamer, some may say, and yet,
This one thought I can ne'er forget,
Nor dream nor waking sets me free,
I seek the earth that is to be.

Sometimes I see a glimpse of it,
In clouds of glory, sunset lit,
But soon, how soon, its colors flee,
'Tis not the earth that is to be.

I gaze upon the stars at night,
Unchanging, with eternal light;
The sages saw what now I see,
But not the earth that is to be.

The hope still burns within my breast,
And never can my soul have rest,
Until with mine own eyes I see
The golden earth that is to be.

THE BLACK MAN AND OUR MISSIONARY CENTENNIAL.

Mr. Editor: The entire American Church just now is getting ready to commemorate the Centennial of our Missionary Society. Although the least of the household, the black man has something to show evidencing the work of the Church during this period among his group.

In 1821, when our Missionary Society was first constituted, there were but two congregations of colored Churchmen, and but one Negro priest, in the entire country. There had been two colored priests up to this time, but one had departed this life, namely, Absalom Jones, the first black man ever ordained. The two existing colored congregations at that time were St. Thomas', Philadelphia, and St. Philip's, New York, and the lone colored minister was Rev. Peter Williams, rector of St. Philip's, New York.

From that time until 1865 some seven or eight colored congregations came to birth, and about eighteen or twenty colored men were ordained to the ministry. During the first decade of the Missionary Society the Bishop of Connecticut ordained at least three colored men who went to Africa. Something over two hundred Negro priests have ored, under the appointment of our Missionary Society in 1835, as teachers initiated our African work at Mt. Vaughan, Liberia, with seven pupils. In 1838 another colored missionary, Rev. Mr. DeGrasse, of New York, went to the West Indies, where he labored and died. Later quite a number of colored clergymen reinforced the work in Africa. Something over two hundred negro priests have been ordained to the ministry during the past century, and nearly three hundred colored congregations have come to birth in this country. Five Negroes have been elevated to the Episcopate, three of them still living. Of those departed Bishop Holly was the first, and organized the work in the Republic of Haiti; while Bishop Ferguson, who for more than thirty years presided over the African Mission, was a direct product of the missionary operations of our society; as well as Rt. Rev. Dr. Gardiner, the present Suffragan of Liberia. Through the same society Archdeacon Russell has not only called into being the largest literary institution of the Church for Negroes, but has completely revolutionized and ameliorated Negro life in the entire section of the country where his school is located. During the same period it has come to pass that a black man, once a slave and illiterate, as a priest of the Church, for two successive General Conventions represented the Diocese of Texas in that body as one of its duly accredited deputies. The indirect influence of the Church upon the black race for good is beyond computation.

The Rev. William Douglass, the first colored man ever ordained south of Pennsylvania (Maryland, 1834), who also was the author of the history of St. Thomas' African Church, Philadelphia, in the preface to his volume, issued sixty years ago, thus accounts for the almost insurmountable difficulties in the way of the Church in reaching the black man. Mr. Douglass says:

"As Methodism addressed itself chiefly to the feelings and affections—which are always strongest among undisciplined minds—the great majority gave their adherence to that system. Another cause of the success of this denomination in gathering to their folds more of the colored population than any other, may be ascribed to their itinerancy. This class of ministers, at the time referred to, made no pretension to literary qualifications, and being despised and persecuted as religious enthusiasts, their sympathies naturally turned towards the lowly, who, like themselves, were of small estimate in the sight of worldly greatness."

FOR STUDENTS IN NEW YORK.

Mr. Editor: In consequence of advertisements placed in our Church papers, and in various New York studios, Greer House, for Church girls studying in New York, was last spring full to overflowing. But we are desirous this fall and winter of renting our rooms to first-year students only—these being the girls usually in most need of the Church's care and oversight. It is not always easy to reach these particular girls, and we should like to ask for the co-operation of your readers in bringing the knowledge of the Greer Club and Greer House to friends and parents whose young daughters are to spend next winter alone in New York for the first time. Board and lodging are provided at Greer House at as reasonable rates as is possible, where two ladies are employed as chaperones, to take charge of the girls (whilst in the house), where there is a good housekeeper, a reception room where girls can invite their friends, a "Dutch kitchen" for teas, and supper parties, and also free use of laundry tubs provided. We can accommodate about sixty girls.

The Greer "Club" has been established for the convenience of our Church students and their personal friends: any students may send their mail there "to be kept till called for": any students coming as strangers to the city may register there—men as well as girls: and for the sum of two dollars they may become members of the club, obtaining use of restaurant, reception rooms, and invitations to all entertainments, dances, etc., given there. We shall be grateful for all help which your readers can give us in making these facts known, for we want to reach the young men and girls who come from all over the United States to study in New York, and who in so many cases feel that there are so few people who "really seem to care for" them. Our rooms are rented to girls only, but it may interest your readers to learn that soon after we opened the house last winter, and long before it was full, we had girls with us from seventeen States, from Mexico, Canada and England. We have had a girl from Jamaica: our first applicant was from Oregon, and we are at present investigating the references of a student from China, and have lately welcomed a "student" girl from Switzerland.

FAMINE IN RUSSIA: AN APPEAL TO AMERICA.

Mr. Editor: I have received from the revered Patriarch of Moscow the following cablegram, forwarded to me by the Secretary of the Russian Trade Delegation in London:

Through you I appeal to the North American nation. There is famine in Russia. A great part of her population is doomed to a hunger death. The corn of many provinces, formerly the country's granary, is now burned by drought. The famine breeds epidemics. Most generous aid is needed immediately. All other considerations must be cast aside. The people are dying, the future is dying, because the population is deserting homes, lands, fields, farms and is fleeing eastward, crying for bread. Delay spells an unprecedented calamity. Send immediately bread and medicines. I am sending a similar appeal to the English people through the Archbishop of Canterbury. Pray may God avert His wrath.

TIKHON, Patriarch of Moscow and All-Russia."

This message needs no commendation. It makes its own urgent and tragic appeal. Its words have singular force, coming as they do from the heroic head of the Russian Church, who in the face of the present regime has at the daily risk of his life continued openly to serve God, and to minister to His people, playing a part similar to that of the noble Cardinal Mercier in Belgium.

All Americans, of whatever creed or political view, will wish to do what they can to aid our government in its measures, under the direction of Mr. Hoover, for the help of the people of Russia in their untold suffering and need brought upon them in large part by the follies and the crimes of those who at present rule over them by force and terror.

It would be an immense reassurance to us in this country, and also to his own people, if the Patriarch Tikhon, the man most trusted in all Russia, could be brought into direct relation with the work of our American Relief Administration.

Is it not possible for this to be arranged?

WILLIAM T. MANNING.

New York City, August 24, 1921.

It is the righteousness of God after which the righteous, but not the self-righteous, man hungers and thirsts; that moral perfection, which is the likeness of God, restored to him, and at the same time brought about by his own endeavor.—Delitzsch.

The Great Commission.

BISHOP ROWE'S SUMMER VOYAGE ON THE YUKON.

Bishop Rowe telegraphs to the Department of Missions that he is leaving Fairbanks for Cordova on the south coast. This means that he has completed his visitation in the interior stations begun two months ago. During that time he visited all the missions on the Yukon from Eagle to Anvik and on the Tanana from the Yukon to Salchaket. During the early part of the journey, he was seriously unwell, but fortunately, he had with him, the Rev. E. J. Randall, of Chicago, who is commemorating the twenty-fifth anniversary of his ordination to the ministry by a trip into Alaska. Bishop Rowe says:

"For several days Mr. Randall helped me. He was a great friend in need and he was a splendid traveling companion."

On the upper Yukon, owing to the irregularity of the steamers, Bishop Rowe and Mr. Randall were compelled to use an open row boat. They made the journey from Circle City to Fort Yukon, Bishop Rowe says, "One hundred miles in eleven and one-half hours, record time. Mr. Randall took his turn at the oars finely."

At Eagle, the Bishop ordained Mr. Burgess W. Gaither to the diaconate. At Fort Yukon, Dr. Grafton Burke, in charge of St. Stephen's Hospital, was also ordained to the diaconate. Mr. Randall helped in the examination and presented both.

Bishop Rowe spent two weeks at Fort Yukon, ministering to the people, encouraging the mission staff and doing a laborer's work upon the hull and engine of the missionary motor boat, Pelican. Finally the hull was made sufficiently tight and the old engine was sufficiently repaired to make the trip to Tanana, where Bishop Rowe hoped to find a new engine that had been ordered shipped in.

On the way down the river, he stopped at Beaver, Stephen's Village and Rampart, besides at many riverside fish camps. Everywhere he had a warm welcome from missionaries, white people and Indian friends, and everywhere his visit brought encouragement and renewed zeal.

From Tanana, Bishop Rowe made a hurried journey to Anvik by river steamer. Here he found the building used for many years as a simple boarding school for about fifteen Indian girls, in such decayed condition that its immediate removal and rebuilding were imperative. Bishop Rowe felt obliged to authorize Dr. Chapman to proceed with the new construction at a cost of probably $8,000, even though he had no funds at hand to meet the situation. As has been so often the case before in the Church's work in Alaska, Bishop Rowe accepted the responsibility, confident that the people of the Church would stand behind him through their individual gifts.

Leaving Anvik, Bishop Rowe traveled up the Yukon as far as Tanana. Much to his regret, he was unable to make the four hundred and seventy-five-mile journey up the Koyokuk to St. John's-in-the-Wilderness. Leaving the Yukon at Tanana, he proceeded up the Tanana River to Nenana and Fairbanks and from Fairbanks, came out over the overland trail by Ford motor to Chitina, where the trail connects with the Copper River and Northwestern Railroad for Cordova.

All along the line, Bishop Rowe found many emergency needs for food supplies and other necessities that he was obliged to meet, but which it would have been quite impossible for him to meet had it not been for the gifts of many generous friends made earlier in the summer. Among the many projects Bishop Rowe feels must have early attention are two for Fort Yukon. He must have, he says: "1. A windmill to help relieve the water supply, a hard and expensive daily problem at present. I cannot say what this will cost, but will look it up. 2. A Delco lighting plant for the hospital. The present acetylene system is a burden. It requires packing much water and disposing of the used carbide is a great nuisance and expense."

The Bishop is immensely pleased with the work of Dr. Burke at Fort Yukon, who, he says, "As doctors go, might be making an income outside five times or more than his salary amounts to here. I dread to think of the time when we may have to replace him, even during his furlough, because doctors are hard to find and when found, may demand a prohibitive salary."

BOONE UNIVERSITY FIFTY YEARS OLD.

September 29 to October 2 are the days set apart by Booze University for the celebration of its first fifty years; an anniversary of great significance. Two chief features will be the opening of the new gymnasium, which, it is hoped, will be completed by then, and the enlargement of the library. Money for the second floor of the library extension was given some time ago by Miss Olivia Stokes, and since then an extremely interesting effort has been made by alumni of the University to secure gifts for the remainder. Through the work and enthusiasm of individual alumni, gifts have come from the President of the Republic ($500), an ex-president ($1,000), and the President of the Shanghai Chamber of Commerce ($2,000). There is evident on the part of the alumni the determination to work in the spirit of their athletic song, "Put it through, Boone fellows, put it through!"

NAVAHO MISSIONS.

The Presbytery of Northern Arizona consists of the northern tier of counties—Apache, Navaho, Cocomino, Yavapai, and Mohave, a territory which would hold the whole State of Indiana, the State of West Virginia, and there would still be room to spare. In this vast region there is not one self-supporting Presbyterian Church. There are here some twenty-six thousand Indians, ninety-five per cent. of whom are still pagan.

The great Navaho tribe, virile, self-supporting, and independent people, occupying the whole northeastern portion of Arizona and lapping over into New Mexico, is steadily increasing in numbers. In 1868 when the United States Government carried them into captivity at Bosque Redondo (Fort Sumner) there were eight thousand of them. To-day there are more than thirty-two thousand, so that they have easily quadrupled in the last fifty years.

The Presbyterian Church has assumed the responsibility for the evangelization of a large part of this field and to-day has ten mission stations located at strategic centers, each one having a territory to cover of about forty miles square, with a population of approximately two thousand souls. The Ganado Mission of the Women's Board of Home Missions is right in the heart of the Navaho country and consists of two stations, forty miles apart, Ganado and Indian Wells.—Southern Workman.

DEPARTURES FOR THE ORIENT.

"All who take part in the missionary work of the Church, and especially those who go to China and the Philippines," were remembered at the celebration in the Chapel of Church Missions House on August 9. The missionaries for whom the service was especially intended were the Rev. and Mrs. C. J. McRae, Professor and Mrs. W. H. J. Taylor and Miss Marion F. Little, for China, and the Rev. F. R. Severance and the Rev. H. E. Catlin, for the Philippines.

MY EVERY NEED SUPPLIED.

Psalm 51:5.
There came a day of conscious sin;
No hope without, no peace within.

Psalm 34:8.
I heard a voice in loving grace
Offer in Christ a hiding place.

Psalm 51:17.
Hungry for bread my soul to feed,
To strengthen it for every need:

Psalm 91:2.
In Christ to find my needs supplied,
No fears alarm with Him allied.

2 Peter 2:17.
Thirsty: The wells of earth were dry;
To healing water I would fly:

John 4:14.
In Christ to find a boundless sea;
For love has yet its Galilee.

Hebrews 13:14.
When wearied with earth's fleeting ties,
For greater bliss the spirit sighs:

Psalm 23:4.
The Christ Who shared my every tear
Dispels all gloom, for He is near.

PRESENT AND FUTURE PROBLEMS.

THE KEEPER.

O strange and wild is the world of men
Which the eyes of the Lord must see—
With continents, islands, tribes and tongues,
With multitudes bond and free!
All kings of the earth bow down to Him,
And yet—He can think of me.

For none can measure the mind of God
Or the bounds of eternity,
He knows each life that has come from Him,
To the tiniest bird and bee,
And the love of His so deep and wide
That it takes in even me.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

RED BLOOD.

A lynching recently occurred in one of our Southern counties under, what it is shameful to say, are the usual conditions. A white man was murdered, supposedly by a negro who was suspected, pursued, captured and safely lodged in the county jail.

Then a mob of cowards, inspired by a few leaders who by their very activities insult the law enforcement agencies of their State, gathered and stormed the jail and took the defenseless prisoner out and hung him.

A newspaper in the capital of the State published an excellent and scathing criticism of the whole thing, pointing out how such conduct brought disgrace upon the whole State.

Some citizen of the community wrote to the city paper in defense of his county, admitting that the action taken was hasty and unfortunate, but saying that the murder was a most brutal one, which was true, and was liable to provoke the consequence that followed in any community where the citizens "had red blood in their veins."

It is just this attitude that provokes so much of our mob violence. People encourage the idea that it is a manly and courageous thing to collect one to three hundred comrades and go to a jail and take out one defenseless man and hang him.

If our young men could only grasp the fact that nothing is more cowardly than such conduct, half the battle for decent law enforcement would be won. The really brave, "red-blooded" man is the faithful officer who, like the sheriff at Knoxville, Tenn., stands out in the open ready to give his life, if necessary, in the performance of his duty.

Such a man is not simply defending the prisoner who is entrusted to his keeping, and who in many cases is little more than a degraded brute, but he is a true patriot standing for the dignity and honor of his State to prove that we have passed from the days when criminal assaults were mere private wrongs to be avenged by the friends of the injured person or persons.

It takes real courage to do one's duty when that task is unpopular, and to stand ready to shoot one's friends and neighbors if necessary to defend the reputation of one's State.

If we could only get it into the heads of our young men of the South that the genuine hero is the officer who is ready to lose his own life, if necessary, in the performance of his duty, we should soon see a cessation of the long lists of riotous proceedings that are defaming our beloved South, and beginning to spread to other sections as well.

It requires no courage to be one of many others to hang a man who is already disarmed and helpless. Joining such a band only shows a weak yielding to a wicked instinct.

If the idea of heroism in mob violence could only be eliminated and transferred to the side of those who are trying to protect not the criminal but the State from desecration, half the battle for order and law enforcement would be won.

Let every minister and leader of thought in the community bend every effort to create the public sentiment of true patriotism which is the love of our State and her fair reputation, as being able to enforce her laws and execute justice, and we shall have an appeal that will be far-reaching and compelling to the young and dashing, as well as to the older and steadier heads.

DISARMAMENT OR BANKRUPTCY.

The importance and necessity for international disarmament is so well voiced in the Saturday Evening Post of August 13 that we quote extensively their editorial upon this subject, which should be dear to the heart of every Christian:

"Armament is an industry; and that industry is threatened. In every nation there is a compact and powerful body of citizens that draws its sustenance from war and the fear of war. These persons look to war for their living just as naturally and with as little thought of evil as the farmer looks to the soil or the miner to the underground wealth that awaits his drill and dynamite. International slaughter is their birthright and their harvest field; and yet it must be said in their behalf that the bond between war and patriotism is so much more frequently exploited than the link between peace and the love of country that the most dangerous jingoes are often sincere and high-minded men.

In every country those to whom war means swift fortunes and fabulous profits are notably successful in frightening ministers into acceptance of beliefs that make for the perpetuation of war. But while this has been going on and a few hundred statesmen have been piling war taxes on a broken-back world, the payers of taxes, the millions of ordinary, uninspired people whose flesh and blood may one day be requisitioned to pay yet once more for the follies of jingo statesmanship, have gone a long way toward learning a lesson that civilization has never before so seriously studied.

Germany is the text-book in which that basic lesson on the economics of peace and war is most plainly written. One of the most striking ironies in that great collection of ironies commonly known as the Treaty of Versailles is that which required the disarmament of the fallen foe. All the world now knows that those sections of the treaty that were designed to leave Germany bereft of all aggressive military power and conferring upon her vast and unsuspected economic power.

The Treaty of Versailles is doing for Germany what a guardian does for a young bankrupt spendthrift. He sets him to work to pay his old debts. He gives him barely enough to live on. He presses his nose down on the grindstone and husbands his assets for his future benefit. No surer road to solvency is known. The bankrupt has but to live to win. Germany was the world's greatest war spendthrift. By force of arms her enemies have compelled her to stop her war wastes and to pour her resources into the industries upon which depends her future salvation. Month by month, as she carries out the program laid down for her, she makes her own future seem brighter and more assured. The world has never before witnessed such swift rehabilitation on the part of a nation so overwhelmed by defeat.

No Japanese, no Englishman, Frenchman, Italian; indeed, no thinking citizen of any belligerent nation who contemplates the present state of Germany and compares it with that of his own country, can help asking himself if the conquered is not, in some respects, better off than the conquerors. Thoughtful men in all the Entente nations see Germany struggling painfully but surely back toward the terra firma of economic solvency while the waves and currents of needless war expenditures are bearing their own governments farther and farther out to sea.

To such distraught, unhappy men our invitation was addressed. Our note appealed to the world-wide sentiment of inarticulate people who were waiting for just such an opportunity to give effect to their inmost convictions and desires. No minister for foreign affairs, no premier would have dared to receive with cold indifference the proposals embodied in the American note. No party government that desired to remain in power would have had the hardihood to set at naught the unceasing national demands for economic relief.

The real test will come when the conference actually convenes and the sincerity or insincerity of its delegates is revealed by the nature of the proceedings. If the great populations that truly desire future peace are represented by envoys earnestly bent upon carrying out the popular will, the good that may spring from the conference can scarcely be over-estimated.

The intense moral vitality that resides in the call for the conference is due to the fact that it had its birth and breeding among the rank and file of the people. The whole movement is scarcely eight months old. For a few weeks Washington regarded it as the puny and futile idea of a few visionary pacifists; but it made such strong and fervent appeal to the good sense of the nation that it swept the country on its merits, and its most powerful opponents were the first to see the folly of trying to ignore it, to bottle it up or to laugh it out of existence."

Sewanee Training School.

In reaching a registration of 306, the Summer Training School for Workers for the Fourth Province, held at Sewanee, Tenn., August 9-23, has exceeded all previous records. Every diocese and missionary district in the province sent representatives, some quite a number, notably Tennessee, South Carolina, Kentucky and Alabama, and nine dioceses outside of the province had delegates, namely, Texas, West Texas, New York, Arkansas, Nebraska, Virginia, West Virginia, Oregon, Michigan, Pennsylvania and Connecticut.

An excellent program in charge of the Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., director and founder of the school, and the Rev. Gardner L. Tucker, D. D., field secretary of Religious Education for the province, provided departmental classes in missions, Religious Education and Christian Social Service, and added to the curriculum this year was a class on the Nation-Wide Campaign conducted by the Rev. R. W. Patton, D. D. Several new features marked this year's plan, among them work for young people in charge of the Rev. Gordon Reese and Miss Jeannette Zeizler, who taught leadership in the Young People's Service League, and took charge of all recreation for young people, and a Healing Mission conducted by Mr. Charles R. Blandford. For the first time the session was extended to two weeks, this allowing for one day holiday, which was given over to excursions, and cessation from work generally.

Mrs. Loaring Clark was dean of the Department of Missions, and classes in normal work conducted by Miss M. P. Ford and Mr. E. E. Piper; "The World-Wide Mission of the Church," conducted by Miss Nannie Hite Winston, and missions for young people, conducted by Mrs. Clark and Miss Zeigler, were given daily, and every afternoon there were conferences on the work of the seven national women's organizations. Among the leaders of these were Miss Grace Lindley, Miss Zeigler, Mrs. John M. Glenn, Miss Mary E. Thomas, Mrs. Felix Ewing and Mrs. E. B. Leaf. The Provincial Council of the Church Service League held two meetings, and a tentative program was outlined for the meeting to be held in Savannah at the time of the Provincial Synod in October.

Under the Department of Religious Education the dean, the Rev. Dr. Tucker, arranged credit classes in all courses of the Christian Nurture Series, teacher training classes, story telling, the Church School Service League, and general principles of religious pedagogy. Practical demonstration of the Church School Service League was given at the parish house of the Otey Memorial Church, and both Sundays the pupils of the Training School conducted model classes in the Christian Nurture Series at the Otey Memorial and the University of the South. Among the instructors in this department were the Rev. C. H. Boynton, Ph. D., of the General Theological School; Miss Mabel Lee Cooper, the Revs. W. A. Jonnard, I. H. Noe, Henry D. Phillips, Dr. H. W. Starr, and Mrs. F. H. G. Fry, Mrs. H. M. Bonner, and Misses Annie Stout and Helen Stephens and Mrs. Folliott.

The Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, D. D., Executive Secretary of the Department of Christian Social Service of the Presiding Bishop and Council, was dean of the Social Service Department, and assisted by Mrs. John M. Glenn, national president of the Church Mission of Help, held daily classes in this work. The Rev. C. T. Bridgeman conducted a class in Christian Americanization.

Holy Communion was celebrated in All Saints' Chapel of the University of the South every morning at 7 o'clock, noon-day prayers were said on the campus when the weather permitted, and otherwise indoors. Every afternoon at 6 o'clock a vesper service was held in the chapel, and short addresses were given. Every morning at 8:30 the Rev. Louis Tucker told some of his "fictional" Bible stories. The first Sunday, at Morning Prayer, the sermon was preached by the President of the Presiding Bishop and Council, the Rt. Rev. T. F. Gailor, S. T. D., Bishop of Tennessee, and the second by the Rt. Rev. Henry J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop of Atlanta. The Rt. Rev. W. M. Green, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Mississippi, preached at one of the Sunday evening services, and the Rev. Loyd Craighill, missionary to Nanchang, China, at the other. A class on parochial missions was held for the clergy, and among the instructors in this work were the Rev. J. A. Schaad, of Michigan, the Bishops attending the school, and the Rev. C. F. Blaisdell. This class was inaugurated last year and will be a permanent feature of the school.

Every evening there was an open forum on subjects of vital interest to the Church, and included such subjects as "The Responsibility of the Church for Industrial Relations," led by Dr. Lathrop; the "National Cathedral," by Canon Talbot; "Americanization," by Mr. Bridgeman; "The Negro Race in America," by Dr. Patton, and "Christian Healing," by Mr. Blandford.

Holiday night was "stunt night," and by State delegations each group contributed to the fun and frolic. Besides a "spiritual gift" presented, each leader handed a monetary gift towards the swimming pool to be built for the students of the University.

Summer Training School for Workers of the Fourth Province, Sewanee, Tenn.

"Position of Women in the Church."

A special conference was called of those in attendance at the Summer Training School for Workers at Sewanee, Tenn., to consider the questionnaire sent out by Bishop Nichols and his committee on the "Position of Women in the Church."

The Rev. Henry Phillips, D. D., chaplain of the University of the South, acted as chairman of the meeting. The first point under consideration was, "Shall women be admitted to those councils of the Church to which laymen are admitted, and on equal terms?"

Discussion was thrown open to all those in attendance, Mrs. W. J. Loaring Clark leading in the negative position and Miss N. H. Winston in the affirmative. Those taking part in the discussion came from the Dioceses of South Carolina, Florida, North Carolina, Texas, Tennessee, Kentucky, West Virginia, New York, Pennsylvania, Alabama, East Carolina, Georgia and others.

When the question was put to vote, on ruling of the chairman, only women in the Province of Sewanee were entitled to vote. Those voting "Yes" were fourteen and those voting "No" were forty. This large majority being definitely opposed to admitting women to the councils of the Church on equal terms with men, made the consideration of Bishop Nichols' other questions unnecessary.

Warning to the Clergy.

I desire to put the clergy of the Church on their guard against a clever swindler who represents himself as a parishioner of Trinity Church, Boston, Mass., and with the aid of a confederate has succeeded in making a number of our clergy believe that they were talking with me over the long-distance phone, and had received assurance from me that the man was what he represented himself to be.

From letters which I have received I gather that the swindler is most plausible, and carries the thing through with great cleverness.

I would suggest that any clergyman of the Church who is led to believe that he is talking with me over the long-distance phone assure himself that such is the fact before giving any financial relief.

Rector of Trinity Church in the City of Boston.

The Piedmont Convocation.

The one hundred and eighth semi-annual Convocation will be held in St. Stephen's Church, Culpeper, September 6-8 inclusive. An interesting program has been prepared associating this meeting with the Centennial celebration of St. Stephen's, and also of the Board of Missions this autumn. Among the speakers are the Rev. William M. Ramsaur, missionary to Liberia; Dr. B. Green, dean of the Theological Seminary, and the Rev. Messrs. Mellichampe, Lanier and P. F. Hall.

A full attendance of the members is earnestly desired.

A. Stuart Gibson, Secretary.

"Little Fork" Church, Culpeper County, is one of the colonial churches yet in regular use for services of this Church. Besides monthly occasions of worship every summer, there is annually a day of worship. Services are held in the morning and afternoon. All the "countryside" gathers, family reunions take place, and friends meet, some after long separations.

On the Tenth Sunday after Trinity the old church was opened for this occasion. The rector, the Rev. K. J. Hammond, invited the Rev. Dr. Downman, of All Saints', Richmond, to preach, and a congregation which filled the building welcomed him.

After a bountiful dinner served from baskets brought by the worshippers, and a social hour, such as is easily found in Virginia, the afternoon service was held, with another address by Dr. Downman.

Church people from the neighboring parishes of All Saints', Mitchells, and Ridley Parish, as well as the members of various denominations represented in that part of the county, came and were most welcome.

This church is the third in this part of the parish: the first having been built in 1730. It was erected in 1783-7, with heavy walls of brick, not brought from England. Recently it has been put in thorough order and ready to stand another century and a half.

The Rev. G. MacL. Brydon, Secretary and Treasurer of the Diocese, is spending his vacation at historic Westover, on the James River.

The Rev. E. E. Osgood, rector of Emmanuel Church, Brook Hill, has been preaching at St. John's Church, Hampton, on the Sundays in August.

The pulpit at St. James' Church, Leesburg, has been occupied for the past month by the Rev. W. H. Burkhardt, a former rector, and now rector of Grace Church, Richmond.

Mr. Charles Penniman, a postulant, who has been lay assistant at St. Paul's Church, Richmond, since January 1, is spending his vacation in the North, after which he will enter the Theological Seminary in Virginia.

The Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, is spending his vacation at Castine, Me.

Decorations Used On Prominent Buildings.

Newspapers of New York have been discovering of late letters and portraits in exterior designs of prominent buildings, put there by architects instead of meaningless figures and scrolls. The discoveries began with that of the $ sign above the door of St. Thomas Church, located at the south of the main Fifth Avenue entrance, and intended for the entrance of bridal couples. The lover's knot is beside the money sign. Later there were found portraits of the Rev. Dr. Stires and of other well-known persons, worked out in stone. There were typical choristers in the choir-room decorations.

Later some figures were found in Synod Hall decorations, some on the front of St. Bartholomew's Church, and still later in the bronze doors of Trinity Church, which fronts Wall Street. Architects have been interviewed, and so have clergy, with the resultant information that architects the world over put into their work faces, figures and ornaments of contemporary history, personality, and incidents, and have done so for centuries; that the decorations discovered at this time by newspaper enterprises have been known to those in charge of these buildings from the first; and that there is much to commend in such decorative style. Much public interest has been shown, and some educational benefit has resulted.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. S. Harrington Littell, of Hanchow, China, was the preacher at the Chapel of the Nativity at the evening service on Sunday, August 28. In his sermon he described the political situation in the Far East, and spoke of the contribution the Chinese Holy Catholic Church (the Episcopal Church in China) is making toward the solution of the problem. He told how the Church in China is growing rapidly, having eleven dioceses with as many bishops and more than 2,000 native workers.

The Rt. Rev. George W. Davenport, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Easton, was the preacher at the people's open-air service, Washington Cathedral, on Sunday, August 28, and at the 8 o'clock service the same day, at Emmanuel Church, Anacostia. Bishop Davenport is the son of the late Rev. Willard Davenport, rector of Emmanuel Church for many years, and is the guest of his mother for a few days in Washington.

The Rev. J. Henning Nelms, rector of Silver Spring Parish, has begun a series of community mission services to be held in the Silver Spring Armory every evening, beginning at 7:30 and lasting an hour. Special music will be heard at every service, rendered by special soloists, children of the community and wounded soldiers from the Silver Spring Training School.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

Death of Prominent Churchwoman.

The Diocese of Maryland has recently lost one of its able and faithful leaders in the death of Miss Edith Duer, of Baltimore.

For many years Miss Duer was Educational Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary for the Diocese, and to her zeal for missions and untiring interest is due the success of the missionary institutes which have accomplished much in developing missionary enthusiasm in the Diocese.

Miss Duer's interests were broad and far-reaching. For years she conducted a Bible Study class for young women of culture and refinement. When the City Mission was organized three years ago she responded for work among the female prisoners in the city jail, and endeared herself by her Christian love and tactful approach to her erring sisters.

One secret of her influence and success was her quick recognition of good in all persons where it was to be found, and her generous championship of it.

She will be missed in the Diocesan Councils, and by many, favored and unfortunate, who have felt the inspiration of her life. With every opportunity to indulge personal ease and comfort, Miss Duer gave her full strength and talents in service of love.

Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

Ordinations.

On Sunday, August 28, in St. John's Church, Wilmington, N. C., Mr. George E. Manson was ordained deacon by the Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop of East Carolina. The sermon was preached by the Ven. Alexander Miller, Archdeacon of the Wilmington Archdeaconry, and the candidate was presented by the Rev .Robert E. Gribbin, rector of St. John's. Mr. Manson, who has been pursuing his course at the Virginia Theological Seminary, has been in charge of St. Phillip's, Southport, this summer, and will return to the Seminary this fall for another year.

Keep, we beseech Thee, O Lord, Thy Church with Thy perpetual mercy; and, because the frailty of man without Thee cannot but fail, keep us ever by Thy help from all things hurtful, and lead us to all things profitable to our salvation; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Clean Hands.

Make this thing plain to us, O Lord!
That not the triumph of the sword—
Not that alone—can end the strife,
But reformation of the life—
And full submission to Thy Word!

Not all the streams of blood outpoured
Can Peace—the Long—Desired—afford;
Not tears of Mother, Maid or Wife,
Make this thing plain!

We must root out our sins ignored,
By whatsoever name adored;
Our secret sins, that, ever rife,
Shrink from the operating knife;
Then shall we rise, renewed, restored,
Make this thing plain!

The Young Doctor's Patient.

"Mornin', Doc. Case for you out to Eli Griffin's camp. Come right away?"

Dr. Pullen regarded the speaker with his best professional air. "What is it, an accident case?" he asked.

"Broken shoulder," was the short reply.

"I'll be ready at once." The young physician turned from the rough-looking lumberman who had rung his office bell, and striving hard to maintain the proper professional bearing under the scrutiny of those furtive eyes, pulled on his heavy overcoat and seized his little black leather instrument case. "I'm ready," he announced briefly, and followed his guide to the curb.

Three months before Dr. Pullen, then fresh from medical college and a short period of active service in one of the large Eastern hospitals, had opened an office in Budd's Crossing, a river settlement in the heart of the North Woods, but although he was the only physician within a radius of twenty miles, he had so far not had a patient.

In front of the office door stood a battered and mud-spattered automobile. The lumberman motioned the doctor to the seat, then gave the crank a few spins. The motor racing noisily, the man plumped down beside the physician and let in the clutch, and with a roar and a bang the car shot forward. Following the main street of the settlement to its end, the driver turned into a rough road, hardly more than a trail, leading to the wooded hills back from the river.

Two or three times Dr. Pullen essayed to obtain further details of the accident from his companion, but the noisy engine made such a clatter the driver apparently did not hear the questions, for he kept his eyes glued to the road ahead and made no reply. The doctor gave up the attempt finally, and settling back in his seat, thought out the entire process of setting a broken arm, a broken collar-bone or a dislocated shoulder, for, he reasoned, perhaps the person he was on his way to see had not really broken a shoulder at all.

Coming to a steep hill, the driver was forced to slow down the machine somewhat and to drop back into second speed, and although the car bobbed violently along the uneven surface and he was obliged to brace himself on the seat to keep from being thrown out of the automobile, the doctor took advantage of the moment to ask, "This party who's hurt—is he one of the men employed at the camp?"

"Why—er—yes, he belongs to the camp all right, Jim does," came the response, and then the driver began studying the wheels on the left side of the car, bending far over the side to do so. "'Pears like that rear tire's a leetle mite soft," he remarked.

The doctor's mind was on the patient, not on the tires, however, and when the driver had resumed an upright posture again he was ready with another question, "How'd Jim get hurt?"

"Wrestlin'," was the brief retort, the word being almost drowned in the noisy exhaust of the motor as the lumberman opened the throttle wide.

The next moment the camp came into sight. The car bumped its way into the clearing, but roared by the bunkhouse to stop short in front of a building Dr. Pullen saw was a barn. Immediately the little car was the center of a motley crowd of lumberjacks, teamsters and camp employees. "Jim's inside, Doc," one of the men volunteered. "Right this way."

Surprised to learn that his patient was not in the main camp building, Dr. Pullen nevertheless stepped out of the car, instrument case in hand and followed the guide towards the dim interior of the barn. At the threshold he paused momentarily, for he suddenly sensed that all was not as it should be. He shot a quick glance about him, and in that brief instant caught something in the faces of several of the men that he did not like. It was an expression of merriment they were vainly striving to conceal. The look of mirth on the faces perplexed the doctor until like a flash it came over him that these woodsmen had picked upon him as the butt for one of their rough jokes.

Was there a patient or wasn't there? A feeling of bitterness surged over the young doctor, and in his anger and disappointment he could hardly resist the impulse to turn and run away from the camp and the men's unruly fun. But the crowd behind pushed him into the building, and in a few seconds required to walk the half-dozen steps he had gained control over himself and was determined not to show anger or disappointment, no matter what followed.

Preceding the young physician into the barn, the guide led him straight to a box stall. Flinging open the door, he cried, "There's Jim, Doc," at which the crowd, clawing and pushing to obtain good vantage points, broke into yells and shrieks of laughter.

His eyes unaccustomed to the half light of the barn, Dr. Pullen could not at once make out what it was that lay sprawled out on the hay, but a sharper look revealed the joke in all its baldness. Almost at his feet Dr. Pullen beheld a full-grown mountain lion cub. Head cushioned on its paws, the beast was glaring at the intruder of its pen out of eyes that gleamed like points of fire.

Prepared as he was for a joke, the young physician had not expected to be pushed into the presence of a wild and ferocious creature like this, and his face paled and his knees weakened. But a glance reassured him, for he perceived that while the beast was loose in the box stall, a huge swelling on one shoulder made the cub harmless. What the messenger had called a broken shoulder was a dislocation, he saw at once, and the animal was in great agony.

"Go to it. There's your job, Doc," a voice in the rear of the group drawled, at which the uproar commenced afresh.

But instead of evincing dismay at the taunt, the young doctor seemed to be perfectly calm and self-possessed. He nonchalantly took off his coat and tossed it to one of the men to hold. Instantly the merriment ceased and the big room became silent as the spectators crowded up close to the doctor. Looking on, they saw him open his case and select a bottle. Removing the stopper, the doctor saturated a wad of absorbent cotton, and advancing boldly to where the mountain lion lay, uttering a low growl now and then, he suddenly thrust the wad to its nose. The cotton was saturated with chloroform, and almost instantly the cub lay limp and motionless.

Dr. Pullen's next movement was more deliberate. Getting a tight hold of the tawny paw, he braced himself and put forth all his strength in a mighty pull to bring the shoulder back into place. The grating of the ball as it slid into its socket was plainly audible to the spectators. The shoulder set, the doctor snapped out his orders. One of the crowd he sent on a run to the camp kitchen for hot water for compresses to reduce the swelling on the beast's shoulder. Another he directed to shake fresh hay down for a softer bed, and Dr. Pullen chuckled to himself as he noted how docile and obedient every one was.

By the time the cub showed signs of returning consciousness, the physician was drawing on his overcoat and closing his little black case. The men stepped back respectfully as he strode towards the door. The doctor kept his gaze straight before him, but he was not unmindful, however, of a hurried consultation between three or four of those who had been most pronounced in their levity, and he was prepared for the summons to "Wait a minute, Doc; what do we owe you for the job?" which one of them called after him.

The physician paused and turned. "Why, I'll be light on you fellows this time and call it square for twenty-five dollars," he answered, determined now to have his little joke, too.

But there was no hesitancy on the part of the men. Pocketbooks were produced and the fee was quickly made up. Then the man who had driven him to the camp led the way to the same battered automobile. "I've got to go to the store, an' I'll drop you off at your office, Doc," he remarked gruffly, and Dr. Pullen, as he settled himself into the seat, told himself that the next time he was summoned to that camp he would not be made the butt of any practical joke.—Presbyterian Banner.

Before Their Day.

"Qui ante diem periit,
Sed miles, sed pro patria."
(Inscription on a tablet at Clifton School, England.)

Here in the bronze their changeless names are wrought
Who in youth's morning hour beheld the shore
Of time fade from their sight, and from their thought
Pass all the dreams and raptures that life bore.
We read the legend with a questioning wonder
At the inscrutable mystery, and say,
Grieving that Death their forms from ours should sunder:
"They died before their day.

Not so. He did not give us Pain for friend,
Nor gave us Death for Hope of Life, in vain,
Though they be dead, yet death is not the end:
Who die for home and country, live again
Who died before their day.

They are forever young. Nor care nor age
Can ever mar their loveliness and youth.
Their story, written on the fairest page
Of life's unfinished volume, reads: "For Truth
And Love and Faith and Honor, nobly cherished,
They gave their all."—Who shall their fate gainsay?—
They, who lived all of life, in that tehy perished
And died before their day.

They do not need our sorrow. Grief and tears
Are rather for the living than the dead.
They are inheritors of eternal years—
We are the children of decay and dread.
Soldiers of God, beautiful like archangels—
Fighters for God and country—let us pray
The lives, the deaths of these be our evangels,
Who died before their day.

—S. W. Episcopalian.

What Margaret Did.

It was only a tiny card that Margaret had picked up on the street corner on her way home from the mill. But somehow she could not get the words out of her mind:

"Look up and not down,
Look out and not in,
Look forward and not back, and Lend a hand."

"And lend a hand." How those words rang in her ears!

"Pshaw!" she said to herself impatiently. "I should like to know what possible ways there are for me to lend a hand to any one outside of my own family. Charity begins at home, and father will need every cent I can earn for years to educate the children."

"And lend a hand," whispered the still, small voice so persistently that Margaret pushed her book aside and gave herself up to her thoughts.

She had left home a year ago and come to work in the mills. They had had sickness and misfortune in the family, and Margaret had bravely put aside her own hopes and plans and come to the rescue.

"I will leave school and go into the mill," she said to her mother. "I shall need but very little for myself, and you shall have the rest."

"But you wanted so much to fit yourself for a teacher," replied her mother sadly.

"I can study by myself evenings," was Margaret's reply. "Perhaps I can do it yet; if not, it does not signify! It is as plain as daylight that it is my duty to work now; so we won't talk any more about it."

But while she had been prompt to see one duty and do it, she had neither thought not cared to look for others. She worked faithfully all day; but she hardly noticed who her companions were. She came and went alone; her evenings she spent in her own little room busy with her books.

"I actually do believe," said Sue Miner one day, "that we might all die and be buried, and an entire new set of hands put in, and she not know the difference."

"And lend a hand"—there it was again.

"I'm doing all that I can do," thought Margaret.

"Oh, yes!" said conscience sharply. "You feel perfectly at ease. You've worked here day after day with all these girls; you've lived in the same house with many of them; you know they are most of them thoughtless, many of them foolish and reckless even, but there's nothing to trouble you in that, for you've done all you can to influence and help them, have you?"

"I don't think I ought to be expected to be doing all the time," pleaded Margaret.

"Why not?" was the quick retort of the inward monitor. "Don't you remember that little extract you fancied so much: 'God never sends you anywhere that He does not send an opportunity with you'? Suppose you look round for your opportunity here and use it?"

It was vexatious; Margaret did not wish to think of it; but she could not seem to put it out of her mind, and more than once during the next few days found herself observing the girls about her. Some looked worn and tired, some restless and discontented, and most showed signs of recklessness. "But, after all, I believe that most of them, anyway, would make good girls if they only had the right influences about them, if they could be kept from the street evenings, and led to like better amusements," was her inward conclusion of the matter.

"God never sends you anywhere that He does not send an opportunity with you."

"But I must have my evenings to study."

"Ah, must she?"

. . . . . .

"The sphinx is waking up; she actually asked me what I did evenings," reported Sue Miner one day.

"What did you tell her?" asked Angie Barrett.

"The truth, of course; but, girls, you should have seen her face when I asked her if she wouldn't like to go to the Dime Museum with me some night! I reckon, though, that I looked about as dumbfounded myself when she asked me to come and see her some evening. The funniest part is, I think I'll go."

Now, Margaret had one gift—she was a rare mimic and reader. Often and often she had amused the children at home for hours by her recitation. The idea had come to her that perhaps that gift might be of use here. "I could amuse them first, and gradually interest them in better things, perhaps. At least I could try, and they would be out of harm's way then, anyway."

So it came to pass that one morning Sue appeared with shining eyes. "Why, girls, she's splendid!" she exclaimed. "The sphinx, I mean. I went to see her last evening, and such fun as I had! She said some pieces to me, and I laughed till I cried. She's coming down to our house in a night or two, and she said I might ask as many of you girls to come as I wanted, so come on, all hands of you, if you want some fun."

That was the beginning. It was hard, self-denying work, and oftentimes Margaret felt that she must give it up, but she persevered. She led them slowly and carefully along; they found themselves interested before they knew it in books they had never thought of reading. She won their hearts, and became their friend. She lent them a hand up.

"We can't ever thank you," said Sue once, long after, "nor tell you what you've done for us; but the Lord knows, and you will have your reward some time."

"I've had it already a thousand times over," said Margaret, with moistened eyes.—Kate S. Gates, in Exchange.

How the Boy Was Saved.

By B. B. Lindsey, Judge of the Juvenile Court of Denver

Shamera, to relate he was in jail. A strange place for a twelve-year-old boy with a soul and heart!

The jailer had mentioned me one cold winter night that the boy was in a storm of crying and had so alarmed him that he urged me to come at once. I grabbed my coat and hat and went out into the night feeling that the pitiless heat of the steely rain was ever louder than a criminal jaw that condemns little children to crime and reformatories. But this was before the fight against the jail was fought and won. This was before love and kindness had supplanted hatred and hatred.—Ed.

Behind iron bars that would shame the king tiger of the jungle I found the boy. He was sleeping and you would have thought not a care had ever visited that little tousled head with its warm and tear-stained face. But he wakened, startled by the grating of long bolts and bars, and clinking of great keys turning in their solemn, monotonous locks, as the jailer, leaving me alone with the boy, returned from the cell back into the dimly lighted corridor.

The boy, frightened at these unusual surroundings, looked at his new cell-mate at first cautiously—almost fearfully. Then a look of joy and gladness came to his eyes, as might come from the captive at the approach of deliverance. The boy knew me, for he had been a thought little urchin, and there may have been worse pickpockets, but they may be left unsaid for it was the sum and the "things" we were trying to reform.

I sat down in the cell on the iron floor and put my arm around the boy. I told him how much I thought of him, and how I despised the bad things he did. Yet what could I do if he did not help me. I might help him, but I could not carry him; I would always be his friend, but he was getting both himself and me in trouble if he swiped things, for if I should let him out and he swiped things again, would not the officer say that the judge made a mistake in not sending that kid to the State Industrial School where he would not have a chance to swipe things?" Then they would say that the judge and the boy should be in jail. How could he expect a judge to keep his job if his boys did such things? He saw the point, and standing upright there in the cell, the light in his eyes speaking better than his words, the earnestness of his promise to "play wild west, judge" as he tearfully declared he would never get me into any trouble and we would both keep out of jail.

And so I almost as tearfully accepted his proffered persuasion, and out of the jail we walked together into the now raging storm. And yet, it was no such storm as had raged in that boy's life—a home blighted by a father who had deserted and trodden under foot every vow he took at the marriage altar. And so a father's care, the divine birthright of every child—had been denied him. The boy was not bad. His opportunity had been poor, his environment was bad. I took him home to his mother, a poor struggling woman deserving of a better fate than to toil all day to feed and clothe her hungry children. A child with no father and a mother however noble who, under such handicaps and difficulties tries to perform the functions of both, generally fails to perform that of either. Is it a wonder then that the child is not "brought up in the way it should go?" Is it the child's fault? If not why, then the jail and degradation?

The boy returned to school. He brought good reports for over two weeks and with them he brought joy and gladness. We had in a poor way tried to supply what was lacking in his life. But to do this well a spark had to be struck somewhere, or a heart-string had to be sounded that would respond.

One day his mother came at the end of a weary, toilsome day to tell me that Harry was a changed boy. She told me how beautiful and loving he was and that once when she had been sick he had, with the tenderness of a woman, waited on her and given up all the pleasures of the street. Finally the tears came into her eyes, and she said: "Judge, I never knew just why Harry changed so much till one day while I was ill and he had been so sweet and kind, I asked him how it was he became good for the judge and looking up into my face with a tear in his eye, he said: 'Well mother, you see, it's this way. If I ever gets paid or swipes things again the judge—the judge will lose his job—see'—and he's my friend—he is—and I am goin' to stay wid him." —Selected

Pussy-Dear's Sudden Trip.

"There Pussy-dear, I'm sorry to leave you, but Grandpa Tracy is ill, and Natilee's mother and I are off to his home in an hour's time. Mother says that kittens might be in the way and so Dollie next door is going to keep you." With the explanation Anne embraced the black kitten serenely sleeping on the porch and hurried away to dress. Very soon everything was ready, and the big car stood waiting at the gate.

"Don't wake Pussy, Natilee," Anne said as they tipped by. "I don't want her to see us go." The little girls were comfortably seated, and soon tearing along toward the Tracys' at a rapid rate. The twenty miles were rapidly driven, and they were all happy to find grandpa better. After finding out that Anne and Natilee began having a good time on the farm. Each morning they would visit the cows, horses and colts, making friends with all the barn-yard animals. One day Anne received a card from Dollie. "We are going to stop by and see you all tomorrow," it said. Then at the bottom a postscript. "Pussy-dear is well." Natilee and Anne gasped. "Who'll keep Pussy-dear while Dollie comes?"

"Oh," comforted Anne, after thinking for a moment, "she's only coming for a day, you see!" Natilee and herself then began planning a happy visit for Dollie. Bright and early the next morning up rolled the car with their little friend and her parents. Mrs. Sams jumped out, lifting carefully a basket by her side.

"This is something for 'Grandpa Tracy," she said. Anne took it from her, and as she did so something inside began to move.

"It's alive!" she cried in astonishment, but Dollie's mother shook her head. Just then, as if to assert that her little mistress was quite right, there came a clear "m-e-o-w" from under the cover of the basket. In an ecstasy of delight the children knelt and opened it quickly, and Pussy-dear, black and merry as any one after her stolen drive, jumped out.

"You precious kitty!" Anne said. "You just had to find a way to come, and now that Grandpa Tracy is getting well, you can stay, too, for a nice visit and change of air."

Every one joined together in a great laugh, while Mrs. Sams remembered that she had left the basket open to put something extra in just before the car came to the door, and, hurrying in, closed it without looking inside again.

"We are so glad," said both Anne and Natilee, clapping their hands as they led the way happily. Pussy-dear was in the procession also, enjoying the frolic as much as any of the guests. —Kathleen Hay, in Child's Gem.

Climbing the Hoe Handle.

Dusk had fallen upon the family group seated comfortably around the living-room table one Saturday evening preparing their Sabbath school lessons for the following morning. The older ones were absorbed in study, and it was so quiet that you could have heard a pin drop until the silence was suddenly broken by a sigh from little Martha. "What is the matter, my child?" asked her mother.

Climbing up into her mother's lap, she replied: "I can't learn my memory text because I don't know what it means."

"Let us read it together," said her mother, "and perhaps I can make it plain enough for you to understand and always remember."

"The eternal God is thy refuge and underneath are the everlasting arms," they read.

The mother thought for a moment, then said: "Listen darling while mother tells you this little story. Do you remember how, early this summer, Mother Robin brought her oldest baby down from the nest in the tall maple tree in the front yard one fine morning and bade him stay close by the front porch so that he might get rested and become gradually acquainted with the ways of the big outside world? What a long, lonely day it must have seemed for little master robin, and how solemn he looked when we spoke to him, but oh, how he trusted his mother and how glad he was when she brought him good things to eat, for father bird was kept busy taking care of the other nestlings.

"While birdie was resting his mother was busy planning a way by which he might be led to a place of shelter for the night. Knowing that the little wings were not sufficiently strong for the baby to fly far, and realizing the danger of leaving him on the ground, the busy little mother surveyed carefully the surrounding premises and to her joy found that a hoe had been left at a convenient angle against the fence in the back yard under the plum tree.

"Thus was the problem solved. Birdie was to climb from the ground up the hoe handle, reach mother's side on the fence, a short fly to the lowest limb, then safety would be assured for the night.

"Flying swiftly to the front and late in the evening, when mother's own little Martha was in sound slumber, she trundled her little birdie over a hundred feet, past a sleeping cat, to the foot of the hoe handle. But the shrewd little mother had not reckoned that the hoe handle was smooth and not like the limb of a tree to afford a good catch for little feet.

"She flew to the fence and coaxed her young one to come to her. Poor little fellow; he tried and tried to climb up the hoe handle, flapping his tiny wings to help him keep his balance, but constantly falling to the ground.

"The mother's cries became distressing and brought your mother out to find the cause of the trouble and help, if possible. Picking the exhausted little bird up and placing him on a limb of the tree was but the work of a moment, and soon mother and baby's difficulties had disappeared.

"I could not help but think, my dear child, that as the helpless little bird had reached its haven of rest through outside aid, so we constantly need our heavenly Father's assistance.

"He knows our feet are weary with slippery paths, and that we cannot find refuge without His help, so He stands with outstretched arms ready to lift us up and guide us to a place of eternal safety.

"Don't you think, Martha, that your memory text seems plainer after this little talk?"

"O yes, mother, and I shall always love to think that God is my refuge and underneath me are His everlasting arms."—Presbyterian Banner.

Liberty Bell.

Here are some things about the Liberty Bell it would be well to cut out and paste in your scrap-book:

July 8, 1776, the bell was rung for the proclamation of the Declaration of Independence.

On October 24, 1781, the bell rang out for the surrender of Cornwallis.

April 16, 1783, it rang out for the proclamation of peace.

September 29, 1824, it rang to welcome Lafayette to the Hall of Independence.

July 4, 1826, it ushered in the year of jubilee, the fiftieth anniversary of the republic.

July 24, 1826, it tolled for the death of Thomas Jefferson.

July 4, 1831, is the last recorded ringing of this famous bell to commemorate the day of independence.

February 22, 1832, it rang to commemorate the birthday of Washington.

In the same year it tolled the death of the last survivor of the Declaration, Charles Carroll, of Carrollton.

July 2, 1834, it tolled once more. Lafayette was dead.

July 8, 1835, while being tolled for the death of Chief Justice John Marshall, a crack was developed, starting from the rim and inclining in a right-hand direction toward the crown.

Its voice is silent, but its deeds will ring in the hearts of all patriotic people so long as the name of liberty shall last.—Selected.

Jack's Courage.

Crash! Bang!

Jack's heart nearly stopped beating, and his eyes grew wide with horror; there was mother's best vase on the floor broken into hundreds of pieces.

"People shouldn't put vases on little tables just where a fellow couldn't help bumping into them," muttered Jack. Still, he had been told not to go into the drawing-room in his heavy boots, and he began to feel rather queer. "Oh, well, they'll think it was the cat," he said to himself, and off he went.

Every one had started supper when Jack came in again, and he slipped quietly to his place.

"Where's Puss?" he asked.

"Oh, she's in disgrace," answered Margaret; "we've shut her up in the cellar. She knocked over mother's new vase."

"No one seems to know anything about it, so we thought Puss must have done it," said mother.

"Oh," said Jack, and nothing more was said about the vase.

Jack took out his lesson books, but somehow he could not study. What was it that new teacher had said? Something about courage; oh, yes! he remembered. "Courage consists not only in bearding a lion or facing a mad bull, but in the quiet performance of unpleasant duties or the cheerful acceptance of deserved censure."

"Acceptance of deserved censure." Yes, that meant taking the blame on yourself; he remembered that.

"Miaow, miaow," came faintly from the cellar, and that settled Jack.

He cleared his throat and began manfully. "I say, mother."

"Yes, Jack," answered mother, softly.

Why would that queer feeling come in a fellow's throat?

"I—I knocked the vase over."

"I'm so glad you told me, son," she smiled back at him. "I don't mind so much about the vase, but I'd hate to think my boy wasn't truthful. Wouldn't you like to let Puss in?"

"My, won't I work hard for father in the garden this summer and buy her a new vase," thought Jack, as he went to the door and called Puss.—Lillian Ladyman in "Jewels."

Subjects for Men to Discuss.

Bishop Fiske, of Central New York, recently received a letter asking how a men's club or study class could be more practically helpful. He suggested a series of discussions of timely topics, with a well-equipped speaker as leader, the men themselves coming prepared to discuss the subject. His list of topics follows:

1. The Christian Sunday and Sunday legislation.
2. What are the essential truths of the Christian Religion?
3. How far is it possible to introduce Christian principles into business or industry?
4. Modern movements in religion and their bearing on the Christian faith.
5. Does the language of the Prayer Book need revision to meet modern needs?
6. Modern society: Whither is it tending and what do you think of it?
7. What can we do and how far ought we to go in urging the practice of religion on our children?
8. What good do I get out of church-going, and what can the clergy do to help me get more?
9. What should be the attitude of the Church towards social, industrial and political problems? What ought it to do in its corporate capacity by definite action?
10. Why do I believe in Christianity?
11. Why am I an Episcopalian?
12. What kind of a service and what sort of sermon helps a layman?

"God works leisurely because He has all eternity to work in. But His answer to prayer is always punctual, though delayed."

Eyster-Wright: Married, on July 30, 1921, in Charles Town, W. Va., at the home of the bride, MRS. ANNE AMBLER EYSTER and MR. ROBERT BRADEN WRIGHT, of Williamsport, Md. The ceremony was performed by her rector, Rev. Conrad Goodwin, and Rev. F. W. Ambler, of Summerville, S. C., brother of the bride.

Wilkes: At Wellesley Hills, Mass., on August 17, 1921, in her ninety-third year, MISS JANE WILKES, daughter of the late Admiral Charles Wilkes, U. S. N., of Washington, D. C. Funeral from St. John's Church, Washington, on August 20. Interment at Arlington National Cemetery.

"Her record of devotion to the Church and the Woman's Auxiliary will be a monument more enduring than brass."

Daingerfield: On August 4, from her home near Lexington, Ky., entered into eternal life, NETTIE GRAY DAINGERFIELD, wife of Major Foxhall A. Daingerfield, who had gone before, and daughter of Colonel Algernon and Annie Henderson Gray, of Harrisonburg, Va.

GEORGE FIELDS RAY.

On the 25th day of August, 1921, at the ending of the day, in his ancestral home, near Beaver Creek, Ashe County, N. C., the soul of GEORGE FIELDS RAY left its earthly tabernacle and "passed between the gates of Paradise," to await the "resurrection morn, when soul and body shall meet again." He leaves a widow, one son, three brothers and three sisters. He was a confirmed member of St. Mary's Episcopal Church, Beaver Creek, and in the seventy-second year of his age.

MRS. MARY ANN MAHONE PLUNKETT.

MRS. MARY ANN MAHONE PLUNKETT, wife of James T. Plunkett, died April 20, 1921, in her sixty-sixth year, at her home on Grace Street, Lynchburg, Va. Mrs. Plunkett has been a devoted and active member of Grace Memorial Episcopal Church since her twelfth year. She will be greatly missed by all who knew her, for her sweet disposition and kind ways were like sunshine to every one who came in contact with her. In recalling her rare faithfulness in all duties of life, in the Woman's Guild, and the home where she was so tenderly loved, where her helpfulness is sorely missed, we must strive to follow her example. We bow to the will of Him Who is too wise to err, that while the sense of loss is great, we yield thanks to Him for the life lived in our midst, for its inspiration and incentive. "What are these that are arrayed in white robes?" These are they which have come up out of great tribulations and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

ELIZABETH CALVERT WHITTLE.

Entered into eternal life in Norfolk, Va., August 13, 1921, ELIZABETH CALVERT WHITTLE, widow of Captain William C. Whittle and daughter of the late General Richard L. and Alexina Taylor Page.

Surviving her are four daughters, Alexina Page Whittle, Elizabeth Sinclair Whittle, Edmonia Lee Whittle, Mrs. James Cabell Dabney; one son, William Conway Whittle, Jr., and six grandchildren.

Passing away in the home where she was born, which had sheltered generations of refined. Christian ancestry, high traits were her birthright, which grace developed into a rarely exquisite personality, beautifying every relation of life.

Within present limitations one can only touch upon such salient characteristics as her modesty, her self-control and her fine, intuitive judgment, making her the final court in all daily questions. With the sunny youthfulness of spirit which she always retained, was a beauty and calm like a benediction. To these were joined a sympathy whose warmth and tenderness were boundless, a faith ever sure and steadfast and a rare spirituality which brought the eternal verities so close that they became a part of the daily lives of those who were blessed with the all-pervading atmosphere which she created.

From a devoted circle here she has joined a devoted circle in the blessed beyond—"the loved long since and lost awhile."

"O blest Communion, fellowship divine,
We feebly struggle, they in glory shine;
Yet all are one in Thee, for all are Thine.
Alleluia."

IN MEMORIAM.

Entered into the rest that remaineth for the people of God, MRS. LAURA ALEXANDER LIPPETT PAGE, at her home in Washington, D. C., on August 13.

Mrs. Page was the daughter of the Rev. Charles Edward Lippett, D. D., and of Mary Alexander. Dr. Lippett was a member of the well-known family of Rhode Island, but became thoroughly identified with Virginia. He was a distinguished professor of the Theological Seminary of Virginia, editor of the Southern Churchman, and later the head of a Church school for girls in Washington. His wife belonged to the Alexander family of Alexandria County, and was closely related to the Lees, the Seldens and the Washingtons and the Lloyds. Mrs. Page was born at the Theological Seminary on the 7th of July, 1839. She attended her father's school, and afterward was a pupil of Mr. Lefebre's in Richmond.

She had a charming personality, a well-trained mind, and was a brilliant musician. She was married in 1873 to Mr. William Page, of Clarke County.

Mrs. Page was loved, as well as admired, by all who knew her as a young girl. Beneath her brightness and gaiety there was a deep religious faith, and there are many who owe their first serious thoughts on this subject to her.

In all the relations of life, as daughter, sister, friend, wife and mother, she so lived as to adorn the gospel of Christ. Whatsoever she did, she did it heartily, as to the Lord and not unto men.

In her long life, full of activities and consecrated to duty, she touched many lives for good. She had left to her children and to all who love her a good example of Christ-like living and a precious memory, full of inspirations.

Her more than fourscore years had their share of what the Psalmist calls labor and sorrow. But faith in God's love, her realization of the nearness and the sympathy of Christ, her gentle patience and her quiet courage, were equal to all the vicissitudes of life. As she lived, so she died, with the quiet assurance of one who had tested the truth of St. John's words, "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith," and who shared with St. Paul the hope that to depart was to be with Christ.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Angels bright from heaven look down,
While the Christian wins his crown;
Spirits dark with wonder see
Weakness gain the victory.

"One reason we do not pray better, I suppose, is that we are afraid of being answered. It is a very serious thing to pray, because we may be taken at our word."—A. McKenzie.

"Let no man pray for victory unless he is willing God should answer his prayer by giving him a battle to fight."—Lyman Abbott.

The word of Jesus, in the mind of one who does not do the will of Jesus, lies like seed-corn in a mummy's hand. —H. Van Dyke.

Show me a single person enjoying healthy repose, vital spiritual poise, rest calm and deep as a river just because life's tide is flowing full and free, and it is invariably the spirit centered in the ever-living heart of God.—F. F. Shannon.

They who know God and obey Him absolutely can reckon on Him with perfect certainty and confidence. Our God delights in the faith that dares to pledge his willingness and power, and He will not fail the soul that ventures wholly on his all-sufficiency. F. B. Meyer.

Faith cannot work without conceptions, without ideals, without hopes. Hopes are the raw material which faith converts into finished webs and garments. When faith ventures, it ventures on a hope, on some hypothesis, on an assumption, if you will, on a dream. That is to say, faith must first have visons.—J. H. Jowett.

No prayer takes hold of God until it first takes hold of the man.—H. Bushnell.

Thou art the vine,
And I, O Jesus, am a branch of Thine;
And day by day from Thee
New life flows unto me.
Naught have I of my own,
But all my strength is drawn from Thee alone.

As severed from the tree, the branch must die,
So even I
Could never live this life of mine
Apart from Thee, O living Vine;
But Thou dost dwell in me,
And I in Thee!
Yea, Thine own life through me doth flow,
And in Thyself I live and grow.
—E. H. Divall.

We are surrounded with motives to piety and devotion, if we would but mind them. The poor are designed to excite our liberality; the miserable, our pity; the sick, our assistance; the ignorant, our instruction; those that are fallen, our helping hand. In those that are vain, we see the vanity of this world. In those that are wicked, our own failty. When we see good men rewarded, it confirms our hope; and when evil men are punished, it excites us to fear.—B. F. Thomas Wilson.

It is remarkable that the first fact recorded in Christian history after the death of Christ is one that warns us against being merely secret disciples. Grace is not a treasure to be "hid in the earth in the midst of the tent." Faith will not stay shut up in the heart any more than a seed will stay shut up in the soil. Sometimes, indeed, a seed may be dropped in some deep furrow where the clods harden over it, until a tearing storm fetches it out into light. Sometimes a Christian may be like that seed, and a storm of trouble may be needed to reveal him.—C. Stanford.

EMPLOYING THE PROPHETIC GIFTS OF LAYMEN

In looking through the pages the other day of a periodical published by another Christian communion, we came upon an item which arrested attention. It was a reference to a service in the Broadway Congregational Tabernacle, of New York, whereby five laymen were commissioned for a special ministry of preaching. They are to continue in their regular businesses and professions which they have followed before, but they are chosen and authorized as men especially gifted to speak the message of Christ to the people, and accredited thus by and for the congregation.

The Nation-Wide Campaign in our Church was notable for the inspiring answer of the laymen to the call for service. Men came to the front then who had never before imagined themselves as taking a prominent part in the Church's work. They led the conferences and neighborhood groups which met in parish houses and in private homes to discuss the Nation-Wide bulletins, and to study the survey, and in general to acquaint the people with the task of Christ's army and their own obligations in relation to it. With courageous dismay sometimes, they marched up the middle aisle to the chancel in the midst of the Sunday morning service and told straight to the faces of their friends what they themselves had come to think about the Nation-Wide Campaign, and what everybody ought to do about it. Some of them were so effective in their message that they were sought for in other congregations than their own, and were persuaded to go here and there in their dioceses, and beyond, as the very most convincing ambassadors which the Church had for its cause.

The prophetic quality of these "voices from the pews" had a value which the Church must not lose. In some dioceses this has been perceived. The laymen who disclosed unusual gifts of service then have been called consistently back into service when particular occasions offered. Some of them have done devoted work by going to neighboring parishes which were vacant, and keeping open by lay services churches which otherwise would have been closed. Many of them have served in mission Sunday schools. But not many of them, particularly if they belong to the larger congregations in the cities, have ever spoken again in their own church.

Have we not missed an opportunity here? Some of these laymen, through the depth and sincerity of their spiritual life, through their knowledge of men and of the needs and temptations of men, and through the unfeigned regard in which their own manhood is held, have a gift to prophecy which the Church impoverishes herself by holding too timorously confined to remote or unusual occasions. When, for example, services are conducted for particular groups and organizations, as happens familiarly in every parish church, the message of a chosen layman may be more incisive and powerful than that of the rector would be; and when the rector is absent at the time of regular services, a sermon preached on a distinct and unabashed religious theme, from the point of view of the layman, by one of their own group, might be immenesly more inspiring to the congregation than a sermon by some strange visiting clergyman brought in from outside to take the rector's place.

What is it that now prevents this sort of use of laymen? Partly it is hesitation on the part of the authorities of the Church, and the inertia which makes us all apt to stay within the fences of "things as they have been before"; but also it is hesitation on the part of the laymen themselves. The best of them are the last men who would push themselves forward. They do not want to claim any presumptuous distinction for themselves. They know that when they do speak it is by an unusual and somewhat casual authorization, and they shrink from even seeming to take too much upon themselves. But what if the Church should openly claim them, and put something clear and distinctive upon them? What if the Church should manifestly recognize the gifts of which these men are stewards, and clothe them with the mandate of the congregation to be interpreters to them? Then when they spoke, there would be between them and the people that bond of mutual understanding and recognition by which any preacher is most fortified.

Already we have in the Church the instrument which needs to be only a little further developed to take care of the great values we have suggested. We have already the office of lay reader. The Bishop may license, and frequently does license, laymen to read services and to read somebody else's sermons to the congregation. But the defects in the present licensing of lay readers are two: in the first place, it consists merely in a form of certificate signed by the Bishop, a personal transaction between him and the layman, with the rector as the third party consenting, but with no provision whatever for that awareness and participation of the whole congregation out of which most of all the lay readers would draw the sustaining sense of the confidence and the expectation of his group; and in the second place, the licensing of lay readers does not ordinarily take cognizance of the special cases of those men who are fitted not only for the mere reading of Morning or Evening Prayer, or for specialized addresses such as those of the Nation-Wide Campaign, but who are men with such God-given spiritual qualities that, though they be laymen still in the work they follow for their livelihood, they ought to be free to speak their own personal and unhampered message, as any prophet would, when called upon to preach.

To make the office of lay reader the greater thing which it may become, to claim and employ to the full for the Church the prophetic gifts which these recent years have unveiled for us among the laymen, is not the way simple? Where the right men are available, let the vestry, or—much better still—the whole congregation, with the counsel of the rector, choose those whom it wants to ask the Bishop to license as lay readers, because it recognizes in them the quality of Christian life, and the gifts of expression, which fit them to be spokesmen of the Lord's truth. And then let the Bishop in the case of these men license them not by sending them a letter in the mail, but through a service in the Church by which, in the presence of the whole congregation, these men shall be acknowledged as interpreters by and for the people.

Book Notices

The Life of Christ. By R. J. Campbell, D. D., Oxonian Vicar of Christ Church. D. Appleton & Co., New York. Price $3.

Any book would be interesting to which a man of the learning and talents of Dr. Campbell would devote six years of preparation, but such a volume is of special value when its subject is that old, but ever new, theme, the Life of Christ. This work is one which should be in the library of every minister who aspires to be a leader of thought in these days.

In his preface the author says that "this is essentially a preacher's life of Christ." This is true, in so far as its helpfulness to preachers is concerned, for the book is arranged so that it is easy to find and study a subject, or an incident in the Saviour's life without waste of time.

Nevertheless, the book is written in such an attractive and readable style, with such broad vision and sane tolerance of all shades of opinion as to relieve it entirely from being a purely technical work.

This attitude of breadth without softness can, perhaps, best be illustrated in the author's comment on the German critics who have done so much in recent times to change the attitude of scholars to the Christ of the gospels. In reference to this extreme criticism, he says: "It would be idle, as well as ungracious, to belittle what it has achieved, but reaction against its extreme conclusions may now be truly said to have begun. Everything has been adduced that could be adduced to account for Jesus on naturalistic hypoheses and every such effort has failed—failed that is, to give an adequate explanation of all the facts furnished to us by the Christian experience of apostolic times; in other respects they have not failed; they have cleared the ground and brought into broad light many things that were previously obscure and unknown, but that are now of the greatest value for obtaining a true perspective upon the whole subject of the life of Jesus."

It is truly refreshing to read the words of an author of so great learning who is so essentially modern in his viewpoint, and yet so orthodox (in the best sense of that word) in his conclusions.

In the opening pages we have a sketch of religious experience that stretches from prehistoric times to the angels at Mons, for as the author says, "the history of man is the history of religion," and he particularly impresses us with the fact that he is writing "to commend a special point of view, the point of view of Christian experience, as being of first unimportance to the study of the gospel records."

The first part of the book is a thoroughly convincing refutation of the insidious teaching of Unitarianism, that Jesus was a great man, but not divine, for, as the author puts it, "criticism of the sacred text went to work hand in hand with exploration of the sacred soil once trodden by the foot of the Son of man together with examination of every historical authority which might by any chance be able to throw light upon the life He lived and the deeds He did, in the hope of coming upon a Christ more acceptable to the modern mind than the supernatural Christ of the inspired record as of the creeds."

He continuees: "We now know what happened. It fully failed in its quest. * * * Ere long it became evident that this Christ was not to be found. Most unwillingly advanced criticism was compelled to admit that He was never there to be found; the only Christ of which either the New Testament, or sub-apostolic extra canonical literature, had any knowledge, was anything but a nineteenth century ethical teacher, an apostle of sweet reasonableness many centuries before His time. * * * It became plain that He was utterly unamenable to modern standards in regard to what is to be expected of a religious teacher who seeks a hearing amongst us. * * * If evidence goes for anything, the evidence of written word, as well as of continuous tradition, is that Jesus of Nazareth even went to the daring length of associating Himself with Deity in unique manner and degree. What was to be made of a person like this? He was as far as possible removed from the conception of a mere preacher of righteousness, the founder of a new ethical religion free from all burdensome and mystifying dogmas. * * * Either He was super-human, as He plainly said He was, or His personality is an utteer enigma to which we possess no key. As stated above, the further alternative that the Jesus of history is either a myth, or that He bears no relation to the Christ of the Church, is not to be entertained by serious scholarship."

These are exceedingly plain and clear statements, and they come like draughts of cool water in these dry days when miracles are referred to in our pulpits in an apologetic manner, and one rarely hears of "doctrine" in the church.

They come, too, with greater force from a man whose scholarship cannot be doubted, and are all the more convincing and stimulating when we find that this writer is no mere rock-ribbed conservative, but is a thinker of the twentieth century with his finger on the pulse of modern thought and development, who cites the results of recent physical research in connection with some incidents of our Lord's life, and does not hesitate to quote from Fredrick Myers' book, "Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death," in discussing the resurrection.

In this review we have quoted somewhat extensively from the book itself, because we feel that we have here a case where the workmanship is of so good a quality that the best inducement to a purchase is the sample of the goods, and we sincerely hope our readers will secure and study this volume, which we believe to be of inestimable value in these times.

In this new book the author of "Greenmantle" and "Prester John" develops the theme of the long romance of heredity, as it may lead back from the prosaic life of any generation through the lights and shadows of the long ago. Once the spirit of kingliness has been in a family stock, it will never be quite lost—so runs the message of the story. The flame may die down and seem to disappear in commonness, but again in some new brilliant figure of another generation it will flash into fire again.

The book, by its very nature, lacks the continuity of a narrative in which the same characters appear throughout, and the interest is not evenly sustained; but it makes good reading as a series of pictures, often very vivid, of lives that move against historic backgrounds from the time of the Norse Vikings, who harried the coast of France, down to our own century.

THE BROTHERHOOD CONVENTION

NORFOLK, VIRGINIA

The thirty-sixth annual national Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew will be held at Norfolk, Va., from Wednesday morning, October 12, to Sunday afternoon, October 16. The main convention will have as its meeting place the large auditorium of the Ghent Club, situated in a beautiful outlying residential district. The principal services of the convention are to be held in Christ Church, one of the most beautiful in America, situated a few rods from the Ghent Club. The Church Boys' Convention, coincident with the main convention, will have its hall and general headquarters in Christ Church Parish House.

The general theme of the convention will be Strengthening the Stakes. Two years ago at Detroit, the Brotherhood's theme was The Challenge of the New Day, meaning the call to service made eloquent by the period of reconstruction following the war. One year ago, at St. Louis, the Brotherhood emphasized in its conference and meetings the theme, Meeting the Challenge, the discussion being upon ways and means of inspiring and doing parish and Diocesan work for the immediate and definite extension of Christ's Kingdom. Today, as reaction is perilously near, we need to strengthen the stakes, so that the cords may be lengthened—nothing lost ,still more gained as the Church presses on.

Most of those asked to take part in the program have accepted, and some acceptances are pending at this writing. Quiet hours of reflection on the Bible will be enjoyed each week-day morning, led by the Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas, recently of Canada, and well known throughout the Christian world. Dr. Thomas is now a resident of Philadelphia and one of the best known of the clergy of the Church in his particular field, the study of the Bible and its popular presentation. The Rev. Dr. G. Ashton Oldham, who will conduct the preparation service, is the rector of St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, and the distinguished writer of a number of theological books. The Rev. Dr. William A. R. Goodwin is rector of St. Paul's Church, Rochester, and will be one of the speakers at the Thursday afternoon general session on the subject of the teaching mission of the Church as a challenge to a life of devotion and service. Bishop Guerry, of South Carolina, and the Rev. Dr. Hubert Carleton, now rector at Wilmette, Ill., and for many years, when a layman, the general secretary of the Brotherhood, will be the chief speakers at the call to the ministry service. A large missionary service is being planned for Thursday evening. This because of the coming one hundredth anniversary of the founding of our Church's Missionary Society. Acceptances are pending, for this service, from Bishop Overs, of Liberia, the first place where our American Church planted a mission on foreign soil, and from the Rev. Dr. Alexander Mann, rector of Trinity Church, Boston.

Christ Church, Norfolk, Va.

Bishop Lloyd, formerly rector in Norfolk, and at one time Bishop Coadjutor of the Diocese of Virginia, has been invited to address the convention on several occasions, notably the giving of the charge to the Brotherhood at the final Sunday afternoon service. Owing to his absence abroad, his acceptance is pending.

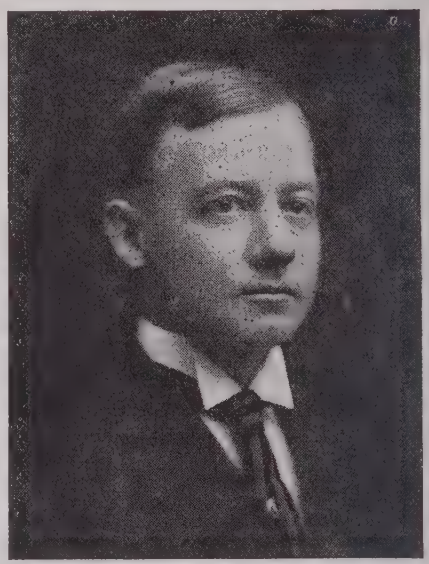
One of the outstanding features of the convention will be the devotion of all of the daylight hours of Friday to the convention pilgrimage to Jamestown and Williamsburg. A special steamer will take the delegates up the James River early Friday morning, arriving at Jamestown landing at 11 o'clock. There Bishop Tucker, of Southern Virginia, will deliver a brief historical address, and the famous old tower, the remains of the fourth church built, in succession, on this historic spot, will be inspected. It is a wonderful spot in natural beauty, and it is now planned to have the convention photograph taken here.

One hundred automobiles are being secured, and as many of that number as are needed, or more, will meet the large party at Jamestown at noon, and take the pilgrims overland eight miles to Williamsburg, where a visit will be made to the famous College of William and Mary, once a Church college, and always one of fine character and traditions. Dr. Goodwin, formerly rector of Old Bruton Church in Williamsburg, after luncheon served in the college dining hall, will make a brief address there on some of the traditions and outstanding features of that splendid educational centre. President Chandler will welcome the delegates.

And finally, in the neighboring Old Bruton Church, the oldest building of any communion in the United States in continuous service as a church, a service will be held, and the present rector, the Rev. E. Ruffin Jones, will say something regarding its history. Recreation will follow, and late in the afternoon the fleet of motor cars will take the delegates the twenty-seven miles to Newport News, from which point they will cross in a steamer to Norfolk, arriving in ample time for supper and the evening service.

This pilgrimage alone will well repay the convention goer for his time, effort and expense. And it has been suggested that during the period intervening before the convention the members of the Brotherhood, especially the Juniors (and all others who contemplate attending) study somewhat the history of our American Church as it deals with this wonderfully interesting district.

And just a word regarding the Juniors. Their convention, like that of the men, is to be open to all in the Church, whether members of the Brotherhood or not. Their sessions will in the main parallel those of the principal convention, and some of the meetings, nearly all of the services, will be common to all. The Boys' Convention theme will be Manliness in Action, and their motto, I am Third, meaning God, the other boy and myself. Canon Skey, celebrated clergyman of the Church of England, is coming from Toronto to be with the boys as their spiritual head during the convention, and Francis A. Williams, of the Brotherhood's staff, will be the lay leader of the snug little convention of several hundred "fellows." A most interesting program has been developed. There will be conferences, questions, singing, speeches, devotional periods, and much—very much—in the form of recreation; and the boys will live together at the annex of the Naval Y. M. C. A. This will be given over to them exclusively.



On the Sunday morning will be the Corporate Communion as usual. It will be at Christ Church, and Bishop Tucker will be the celebrant. At 11 o'clock, in as many churches throughout the city as their rectors and pastors desire, laymen, and some clergy, of the convention will make addresses of a general character on the common subject, "Am I My Brother's Keeper?" It is hoped thus to bring the challenge to personal service to as many Christian people of all creeds as is possible.

The convention, contrary to the usual custom, will close Sunday afternoon instead of evening, with a general mass meeting in Convention Hall, where the memorial record will be read, the convention's message to the Brotherhood adopted, and the charge to the Brotherhood given. To this, as to all services and meetings, the general public is to be invited, that all may know and appreciate what our

A registration fee of two dollars is required of all adults, and of the boys one dollar. This applies to local delegates as well as those from afar. The cost of the Jamestown-Williamsburg pilgrimage will be the nominal sum of two dollars for the men. The boys will be carried free. The luncheon at Williamsburg, however, will be seventy-five cents for the men and fifty cents for the boys. For the daily lunches at the Ghent Club the charge to men and boys will be the same as that at Williamsburg. The boys will be housed at the Naval Annex at fifty cents a night, and the cost at hotels, European plan, will range from $1.50 up. A rate of a fare and one-half has been secured on nearly all railroad and steamboat lines, based on the issuance of a minimum of 350 certificates.

All men and boys of the Church, their rectors and their choir masters—in fact, all interested in the work of men and older boys—are invited to attend the convention. Any information may be had by addressing the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, 202 South Nineteenth Street, Philadelphia, or Robert M. Hughes, Jr., Norfolk Chairman, P. O. Box 317, Norfolk, Va.

SAO LEOPOLDO

The Rev. James W. Morris, D. D., Porto Allegro, Brazil

I am sure I do not know who this St. Leopold was: but the place that bears his name is a fair-sized town (say of about five thousand people), some thirty-five miles from Porto Allegre.

Here we have had a very humble little congregation for several years, the majority of its communicants being composed of the sons and daughters and grandchildren of a devoted Christian woman.

The congregation has suffered from the removal of its members, and from an unfortunate controversy that arose shortly after its incipiency. Then, too, it has had no resident minister for some years. So that, altogether, it is a rather discouraged little band. They are of the sort that tell one what a great time they used to have, what large congregations there used to be, what zeal there was once. They are discouraged by the first works which were once done and now are not done.

The Bishop finally gave the charge of this little group to our Archdeacon Cabral. He put new heart into the little congregation, although he was able to visit them only once a month, and then on a week day. Ultimately, at our last Council, which met in April of this year, the Bishop and Archdeacon Cabral thought it good that I should take charge of the work there and give them, with the aid of our students, a regular Sunday service. And so I am once more in charge of a Brazilian congregation, and therefore, when one of my people asked me the other day how old I was (such questions are polite attentions with some of our people, like the queries as to one's health), I promptly replied, "I am again just thirty-one, and have forgotten how old I used to be!"

But this town is a German settlement, one of the oldest in Rio Grande. The people are in large part German, and the language heard on the streets is prevailing German. The population is about evenly divided between German Romanists and German Protestants: and the distressing thing is that the Romanists are intensely zealous, while the Protestants are in large part indifferent. But there is just now a good man in charge of the German church—an earnest Christian and a good preacher. He is a good friend of ours. He tells me that he has between four hundred and five hundred families under his charge. He has people in the country districts as well as in the town He has a very fine church building, whose tower clock gives the hours to the whole town. He showed me over it with great pride, especially making me admire his fine new organ. I hear that he has good congregations, and has been able to put a new spirit into the people.

The Roman church has in the town large educational establishments. There is an immense girls' boarding school, under the direction of a German Sisterhood. But the principal institution is the seminary. I was told that there are between two hundred and three hundred students in this school. Of course, the larger part are small boys, who, according to the Roman system, are already in some sort candidates for the priesthood.

Our little congregation is composed of Brazilians, with a few people of German parentage. Our influence is important, and needed as the German church has all services in the German language. The German pastor recognizes that we must have a Brazilian Protestant church, or be lost.

I go up by train two Sundays in the month, and one of my students goes the other Sundays. We have an enthusiastic Sunday school of thirty children, as well as some adults. Then at night we have Evening Prayer and sermon. Things have begun to be brighter with regular services. The children are much interested. They are taught Bible stories and the Church Catechism. Some have already received prizes for excellence in the latter. Besides, we took up an offering for the China famine sufferers, and sent $3 to New York for the same.

The people are, nearly all, very poor indeed, and their small gift of money was for most of them a real sacrifice.

The weather this month has been cold, rainy and disagreeable, so our attendance has been small. The people have insufficient clothing, and in these raw days of autumn-like winds and rain they cannot come out. Indeed, Sao Leopoldo is immediately on a river, that flowing sluggishly, runs over the undrained lowlands, forming frequently ugly marshes. In the morning and at night I have felt as cold as I have in Richmond with snow on the ground and ice in the fountain in Monroe Park. From now on we shall have a better time.

I am distressed about the misjudgment of our country by intelligent Brazilians. We seem to have become, in their eyes, a selfish, money-seeking, imperialistic nation. They think of us with profound distrust and suspicion.

Coming from Sao Leopoldo lately, I overheard the conversation on the train of two clever young medical students. They were discussing the fate and the future of the world.

"We were fools about North America," said one. "She never cared for anybody but herself. She stayed out of the war till she'd got all the money in the world, and then went into the war so as to make sure she would not lose what she had made."

The other fully agreed, and added that the spirit of North America could be seen from the name she arrogated to herself. "She calls herself America—and her people are Americans—as if there were no other Americans but they. That is enough to show what they mean when they talk of Monroe Doctrine and America for Americans. They mean America for the North Americans—and the rest of America, bossed by them, made to behave and be good."

I could but laugh; but then I had to think whether there was not some appearance of truth in what they said. The war certainly has added to our riches and power, and we seem determined to make the most of it all for our own good. We do not yet seem to have appreciated that we are given this great position not for self-use, but for world service.

Would that our great country could realize what she is put in this world for; and how her influence may make or mar the work of Christ for men!

Porto Allegre, for example, is flooded with horrid movie films—low, disgusting, often bestial, always sensational and abnormal; and they are corrupting the minds of thousands. They are all American films;; the worst of them blatantly American. The papers constantly publish our great prize-fights, our amazing divorce statistics, our negro baitings. our suicide record, etc., with sarcastic comment like this: "North America does all things on a vast scalee. Even in religion she is olossal. She has so many religions and such a multitude of sects that they overflow and pervade other countries. Hence American missionaries, like American kerosene and American autos, are everywhere."

We know that what of greatness we may have is measured by what we have of Christ's truth and of Christ's spirit—and things like those mentioned above make it impossible for these people to see the truth. Surely the real business of our nation in this world is to witness to God Almighty in His Son—to testify that His righteousness alone exalts any people. Whatever impedes or impairs that great business is not strength, but weakness: it is dead loss, whatever its heaped up honors.

THE INCREASE OF KNOWLEDGE: DANIEL'S VISION

The Rev. George William Douglas, D. D.

He said unto me, Understand, O Son of man. Shut thou up the vision, for it belongeth to many days.

O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book to the time of the end: many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.—Dan. 8:17; 12:2.

But the multitude of the wise is the welfare of the world.—Wisdom 6:24.

Wisdom is the principal thing, therefore get wisdom: yea, with all thou hast gotten, get understanding.—Prov. 3:7.

The love of the Lord passeth all things for illumination. —Eccl. 25:1.

These assembled texts, taken thus together, give the solemn undertone of the whole Word of God. In Ezekiel's visions of the Wonder of life, the waters are rising and rising till they are beyond man's depth. Daniel saw the same Wonder: men run to and fro, and knowledge is increased.

In the quaint old English town of Grantham, which few visit nowadays, there is a statue in bronze of a man to whom, so far as human affairs go, the modern world owes more than to almost any one else—Isaac Newton. But it is not generally known that he was as convinced a student of the Bible as of Natural Science. In his lifetime, when people came from far and near to do him honor, they were surprised to find him, as one admirer records, with an open Bible on his knees. And as they roused him from his meditations, he shook his head and murmured, half to himself and half to his visitors, "Ah, those prophecies of Daniel! Those prophecies of Daniel!" And he went on to let them know that along with his own scientific reasons for anticipating a marvelous exhibition of rapid transit by mankind he, Newton, compiled Biblical reasons. Rapid transit on this earth in unheard of ways was to be the natural result of man's inventions; but to Newton it was also a striking fulfilment of Daniel's vision thousands of years before.

Consider, first, how in our day men are running to and fro, and thereby knowledge is being increased. Statisticians tell us that in the era of Julius Caesar the population of the world was about fifty four millions. Now it is about sixteen hundred millions. Yet so limited and difficult were the facilities of communication and travel in Caesar's day that hardly five per cent. of the population were in touch at all, and then only at long intervals. But at present—what with the railways and the ships propelled by steam and the aeroplanes which count it a small matter to pause a moment on Mount Blanc on their way from continent to continent—at present as many as the fifty-four million inhabitants ascribed to the whole world in Caesar's time are carried to and fro in a single month in New York alone. And to every one of these i offered the latest news from everywhere—San Francisco, Calcutta, Tokio, Berlin, Paris, London, even from the islands of the sea.

Put it another way. Historians agree that Xerxes probably conducted the greatest army that was ever assembled in antiquity. Yet in the few years last past fifteen times the number of Xerxes' army were marshalled in our world war. In the Middle Age the crusades were regarded as a very romantic pilgrimage; they lasted altogether about two hundred years; yet according to the best information less than five million people were engaged in the crusades; whereas the official figures of the New York Rapid Transit Company show that ten million people would be less than the New York subways carry in one week. Forty years ago each inhabitant of New York on an average took one hundred and forty-six rides a year; but today the figures allow for every man, woman and child taking one ride daily. There is nothing in human history to compare with it; and to do justice to the spectacle you must keep also in your mind's eye the Chinese farmers listening to the locomotives in the valley of the Yang-Tse-Kiang; the pony express in Patagonia, the reindeer mail service in Alaska, the bank runners in the interior of Asia, the Cape-to-Cairo route fast finishing in Africa. A friend of mine has published the fact that when Marconi was last here he asked him: "Why don't you talk to Mars?" Instantly Marconi replied: "I can do it—do it easier than I can talk from New York to London." "How can you?" "Because in getting across the Atlantic we have three thousand miles of atmosphere which the wireless waves must go through, whereas between here and Mars there are only thirty miles of air enveloping the early and probably about as much enveloping Mars—sixty miles altogether. Only one condition remains in the way. If you will supply it, I will begin business tomorrow." "What is that?" "The human intelligence at the other end—the understanding mind to receive what I send."

But, men and brethren, according to the Bible, the very same thing is largely lacking here on this earth. Notwithstanding the wide and rapid spread of news, there are far too few understanding minds to take in the proffered knowledge. To that parley between Marconi and my friend I would like to add another condition—to ask another question. What is the present effect of this marvelous rapidity of travel which Daniel foresaw in a vision, but which we see wtih naked eyes? What is the result of this stupendous increase of knowledge upon the human soul? It is one thing to have knowledge at your door; it is another to utilize it. The great inventors, in a way and for earthly purposes, used their knowledge well, opening up new ways for us to use our knowledge on higher lines. But are we doing our part? The Divine Spirit that cooperates with our spirits expects us to turn our knowledge to high moral and spiritual ends; but the disciplinary process of such mental and spiritual adaptation is what we shirk. It was said of the distinguished Frenchman, Montesquieu, that he needed the French Revolution to wake him up to the new issues of his time. Well, we are having a revolution now, but the mentality of most of us is still asleep in the old ruts. When knowledge was scant, it was not fatal to society that wise men were few; but when knowledge is generally disseminated, there must be many wise men, or else civilization and religion are likely to be submerged. I have seen it stated that there are fewer book stores in the United States of America today than before the Civil War, although our population has vastly increased. That does not look as if our people generally were applying their minds to the new knowledge. It looks rather as if the poet Wordsworth's complaint of the state of things two generations ago in England might now be brought against Americans: that for the average crowd

Take a definite instance. The public school system was a creation of the nineteenth century. Thereby there was an increase of knowledge; yet this was in the very period when we allowed our abominable factory system, our sweat-shops and our slums to exploit men, women and children as if they were soulless tools. Now we see the result, but we might have foreseen it if only we had applied the knowledge of human nature and history which was to be had gratis. Men run to and fro and knowledge is increased wonderfully, but if you stop at mere knowledge of how things can be done, behold the factory system and its unnecessary horrors. Get wisdom: get understanding: It has been quoted as characteristic of the Old Regime that Lord Melbourne said: "I carry no watch. I ask my servant the time, and he tells me what he likes." But you and I are at the pass where the average day laborer not only determines the time, but shirks so that production flags. And when our workers have thus shortened their shift, how do they employ the leisure they have won for themselves? By cultivating their brains and improving their souls? Oh, no! There are some exceptions, and all honor to them; but the majority loaf. We are wont to say that the Feudal System is outlived; but, having outlived it, are we utilizing the knowledge that our experience of feudalism gave us? Are the rank and file of men, be they underlings or capitalists on top, ready to make a wiser, practical application of our vastly greater opportunities than the privileged few did in the days that are past and gone? Visualize to yourself for a moment what must be the real conditions of our time, when it is possible to hold up shirking as a doctrine of democratic idealism! With all our provision for thinking, are we a thinking people? Even among those who have leisure for it, is there much enthusiasm for hard, persistent brain-work and spiritual meditation? Three years ago many of us were doing our best by word and deed to make it disgraceful for a man to be a slacker in war-time, but how about the intellectual slackers in peace-time? Here is an ominous sign. Not only have we thousands of brawny men who insist on the eight-hour day, but even in those scant eight hours they deliberately dwadle. We have just celebrated Labor Day: is not this a question which every one of us—rich or poor, workers with brain or with brawn—ought to put to ourselves: What happens to a man, intellectually and morally, who thus pretends to work, and claims pay for it, but does not work? What becomes of his character during those eight slouching hours? Probably that man styles himself a Socialist, and thinks himself an idealist. Judge therefore what people's mentality must be, when shirking can be extolled as idealism—a good example for mature men and women to set to growing boys and girls! One recalls the biting sarcasm of the message in the Apocalypse to the angel of the church in Laodicea: "I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot. I would thou were cold of hot. So because thou art lukewarm, and neither hot nor cold, I will spew thee out of my mouth." It is because men don't work hard over their opportunities, so as to turn their knowledge into understanding, that they fail to make good the wonderfully increased knowledge of this life, and the knowledge of the world to come, which is in their power.

The religious man, who utilizes the abundance of our present information to the full extent that God intends—that man is on the way to ascertain better than ever that our rapid life requires Chris if we will be saved here and in the life to come. "The love of the Lord passeth all things for illumination." As men run to and fro, and knowledge is increased, human life takes on the appearance of a vast kaleidoscope. so quick and changeful as to tire the eyes. But, to the religious insight, there is one Object that lasts and stays: "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, today and forever." And to such there is a new, more penetrating appeal in the inscription that Dante saw over the Gate of Paradise: "In sua velontade e nostra pace": "in His will is our peace." And not for naught does the Bible draw the distinction between knowledge and understanding. "Wisdom is the principal thing, therefore get wisdom: yea, with all thou hast gotten, get understanding." It is "the multitude of the wise that are the welfare of the world"; and Jesus Christ is the way to wisdom, for He is wisdom personified, realized in human life.

I am not a pessimist. A minister of the gospel cannot be a pessimist; but he must accept Christ's, not man's, standard as to what constitutes pessimism, and he must refuse to prophesy smooth things and deceits to men, when the Bible and Christ prophesy rough and right things (Isa. 30:10). I am sure that we Christians have before us a heart-searching ordeal. We shall be flooded with quack specifics for old ills. We shall be told that two and two ought to make five instead of four. Rapid radicalism will handle culture roughly, being impatient of the slow plodding whereby the true Christian waits upon the Lord to enable him to convert increased knowledge into increased understanding. Meanwhile the impartial Jesus thinks no less of the man who dislikes to rack his brains than of the man who dislikes to rack his muscles, but offers equally to all the same opportunity of further effort, saying, "Friend, come up higher." Lethargy—be it physical, mental or spiritual—lethargy, which will not master the facts even of this world, to say nothing of the world to come, is what Christ deplores. When the radicals, as a necessary concession to present necessities, allow that it is no ill for ordinary people to work if you reduce it to eight hours now and by and by to six—to such idle rhetoric Christ replies with quiet dignity, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work"; and He says that in the ears of all workers, physical, intellectual, spiritual. He knows that for all types hard thinking hurts, and He recognizes no essential difference in the arduousness of men's callings, since, no matter what the calling be, genuine faculty must come to the hard test of action. It is at the point of action that Christ meets the Christian and says, "Take up thy cross, and follow Me. Lo, I came to do Thy will, O God. I am content to do it. Yea, Thy law is within my heart."

How different that is to much of what we hear, as we run to and fro! Perhaps those early Christians who foresaw a time of desolation and anti-Christ, for us as well as for themselves, were not far wrong. In Germany not long ago an unbeliever remarked: "The net is now drawn so tight about the Church that if it escapes this time I will believe in it." That was said before the war was over, and the issue of it for Germany so plain. Whether that man is alive now to believe I do not know. But if he be, let us pray that he and all of us who are honest doubters, like Thomas of old, may understand at last "the love of the Lord Jesus, which passeth all things for illumination."

MOHAMMEDANS IN AMERICA

George M. Lamsa

I have had in mind for some time to write an article concerning the Mohammedans in the United States. For two years I have taken a great interest in this subject and have made investigations all over the country among the Mohammedans. Thanks are due to the faculty of the Virginia Seminary for the great interest which they have taken in this work and for the spirit which I got in that institution, and also to the Rev. Mr. Burgess, secretary of our missions among the foreign-born.

There are at present 60,000 or more Mohammedans in this country. The majority came during the great war. They came together with the Christians of their native land who spoke their language, and they are mixed with them also in this country, but they have maintained their own religion steadfastly although they have not had any church organization until this year in Detroit. Last year I made a survey and traveled about 9,000 miles at my own expense. I reported about these people to many churches of various denominations to the great surprise of some of them who knew nothing about the thousands of Mohammedans who live in their own cities. At first it was very hard to convince the minds of the religious authorities regarding the above number of Mohammedans in this country because they knew little or nothing about them. The only Church which had taken a little interest and had known something of the conditions was the Methodist Episcopal Church. They were in touch with the situation but they did not understand how to reach them. They still are eagar to enter into this field of work which they realize is very important, if only they could get a man who would be their adviser. I think we have a great chance to do something for these people in this country and let them go back perhaps to convert their own people (which we have failed to do in seventy-five years) because they know the needs of their people and will understand their mind. These Mohammedans in this country are influenced by American civilization; they understand something of American ideals and are anxious to reform their own land. On my second visit to Detroit in 1921 I found that things were different from the year before. I saw that the Mohammedans had built a mosque and organized in every way as regards their religion. If we had started to work among them last year we might have stopped them from building the mosque. It is a significant fact that this is the first time in the history of America that a Mohammedan community has been organized and a Mohammedan mosque built in our midst. It is small at present but we must consider the future.

The number of Mohammedans in Detroit is about 15,000. They are of all races which have embraced Islam in the east. The majority are Arabians, Kurds and Turks. They are supplied with one sheik and one Imam (minister) to work among the community. They have also organized for work among Americans,—that is, to convert Americans to Islam. This work is under the jurisdiction and management of a missionary from India who is known as Shiek Sadig. His wife is an English lady. He is a philosopher, scientist, mystic. He has over a dozen degrees and he is a man of wonderful spirit and personality. He has spoken in some Christian church in Detroit. He is the only executive I met in the Mohammedan church. He has a good staff and office equipment and handles the publicity work. All the expenses of the two fields of work are financed by one man, a Syrian Mohammedan who has made his fortune in Detroit, beginning as a laborer in the Ford factory. He gave $50,000 for the mosque, has started a newspaper, gives money to the poor, etc. He is very generous and very religious and sincere, and yet is entirely uneducated. I had a conference with this rich Mohammedan and two sheiks. We dined together and discussed all the problems of their organization and what they are trying to do. They told me that their mosque is open to everybody. They would welcome a Christian minister of any Protestant denomination to speak to them, they said. They also gave me an opportunity to speak there on August 21st. I lectured to them on religion and the future of the remnant of races of the Ottoman Empire. I also told them that the Episcopal Church is very much interested in them and is planning to organize a community center for them, to help in educating their children and to aid the working people in every way possible; and they said they would welcome any Episcopalian to work among them.

I made some investigation to see how far the Mohammedan church was advancing in Detroit. There are some women converts to it at present. The great question is the future of this religion in America. If it is only going to influence older people it will not matter. But I have been asking what stand the children of Mohammedans will take. Will they continue to go to the mosque or will they go to a Christian church? Most of their mothers are Americans, converts to Mohammedanism when they married Mohammedans. If the younger generation stands by Islam, a spread of this religion in America is foreseen.

I came to Detroit to work under the auspices of Bishop Williams and the Rev. Mr. Burgess. I found the situation is very bad. The Episcopal Church has no funds for this work nor experts to do it. Mr. Burgess is full of zeal and very sympathetic but is limited as to funds. I have discussed this question of foreign work with many Christian men who think that the Episcopal Church must start the work among foreign people and show Americans what the Church can do for this country. It is work that can be done only by the Church. There are a number of clergy who are interested in this work but have no means and it is a fact that many Episcopalians have subscribed money to various organizations for work among foreign-born which has never reached the people it was intended for.

The Church authorities of Detroit are all out of town and my plans are entirely upset. The Methodist authorities have invited me to have a conference with Bishop Henderson and other officials who are worried about the situation in Detroit and are ready for work at any cost.

I will thank all church people who take an interest in this work and have any funds to contribute if they will send them directly to Mr. Burgess, not to any other organization or solicitor without credentials. I believe the Episcopal Church will be the greatest agency to reach the foreign people. It is the only Church in America that appeals to all of them. I believe that this Church can show that it is only the Christian Church that can deal with the foreign problems in America or that can meet the propaganda now being spread about which is opposed to American ideals.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

EDITOR OF ST. ANDREW'S CROSS TO DR. SHIPMAN.

Mr. Randall requests that we publish the letter given below. Ed. S. C.

The Rev. Dr. Herbert Shipman, New York.

My Dear Dr. Shipman: May I express my regret for my hastily written editorial in the August number of St. Andrew's Cross.

So far as personal qualities are concerned a Diocese of course is free to make its own choice, and I recognize that my remarks were out of place, as well as personally discourteous, though this was far from my intention. Let me beg you to accept my apology.

As this letter or its substance is too late for insertion in the current number of St. Andrew's Cross, I am requesting the general Church papers to give it immediate publicity.

I beg to remain,

Very sincerely yours,

(Signed) G. H. RANDALL.

Waterville, N. Y., August 27th.

THE CHURCH AT WORK.

Mr. Editor: There has been so much advertising of the Church at work that it is somewhat hard to comprehend the meaning of the term. Work is generally supposed to mean the use of one's faculties, as near continuously as the object to be accomplished demands, and yet we see in every direction for nearly ten weeks parish houses closed, Sunday schools scattered and no provision made for those who would try to keep together the ones who do not want to be scattered, and who would gladly try to keep some lambs from going astray. Why should this great Church of ours spread abroad the impression that she does such effective work in ten months, that the other few weeks may be left in idleness? Parish houses closed, lesson and Church papers, costing money and considered valuable at times, but allowed to go to waste? There are many in the Church who do not go away or want to be idle. What of them?

Huntington, L. I. H. PAULDING.

THE WORTH OF THE SOUL.

Let me try to point out to you what some of the effects will be in a man's preaching from a true sense of the value of the human soul, by which I mean a high estimate of the capacity of the spiritual nature, a keen and constant appreciation of the attainments to which it may be brought. And first of all, it helps to rescue the gospel which we preach from a sort of unnaturalness and incongruity which is very apt to cling to it. Consider what it is that you are to declare week after week to the men and women who come to hear you. The mighty truths of Incarnation and Atonement are your themes. You tell them of the birth and life and death of Jesus Christ. You picture the adorable love and mysterious sacrifice of the Saviour, and you bind all this to their lives. You tell them that in a true sense all this was certainly for them. I do not know what you are made of, if sometimes, as you preach, there does not come into your mind a thought of incongruity. What are you and these people to whom you preach, that for you the central affection of the universe should have been stirred? You know your own life. You know something of the lives they live. You look into their faces as you preach to them. Where is the end worthy of all this ministry of almighty grace which you have been describing? Is it possible that all this once took place, and by the operation of the Holy Spirit is a perpetual power in the world, merely that these machine-lives might run a little truer, or that a series of rules might be established by which the current workings of society might move more smoothly? That, which men sometimes make the purpose of it all, is too unworthy. The engine is too coarse to have so fine a fire under it. You must see something deeper. You must discern in all these men and women some inherent preciousness, for which even the marvel of the Incarnation and the agony of Calvary were not too great, or it is impossible that you should keep your faith in those stupendous truths which Bethlehem and Calvary offer to us. Some source of fire from which these dimmed sparks come, some possible renewal of the fire which is in them still, some sight of the education through which each soul is passing, and some suggestion of the special personal perfectness to which each may attain, all this must brighten before you, as you look at them; and then the truths of your theology shall not be thrown into confusion, nor faded into unreality by your ministry to men.—Philips Brooks.

A young Christian, at the deathbed of an aged saint, said to him, "Shall I read to you the sweetest verse of the Bible?" "Yes." The young man read the second verse of St. John 14: "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so I would have told you." "No," said the dying man, "that is not the sweetest verse. Dead on." The young man read, "And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." "It is not the mansions, it is Himself I want."

FISH SITUATION IN ALASKA SERIOUS.

Bishop Rowe recently wired from Port Yukon that the fish situation in the interior of Alaska was becoming serious again. The telegram has been followed by a letter written from Tanana, in which the Bishop says:

"In refernce to the canning business on the Yukon, I supposed the matter was settled—that after September 1, 1921, it would cease. But on arriving here I found that an employee of the cannery has been traveling along the Yukon and getting signatures to a petition asking the Bureau of Fisheries to set aside the order of December 18, 1920, to the effect that commercial fishing ceases on the Yukon after September 1, 1921. The said employee has made the statement that should the Bureau of Fisheries deny the petition, that his company would fish outside of the mouths of the Yukon and absolutely so seine them that no salmon would escape to go up the Yukon at all.

"We must get busy to protest against said petition. I am informing you so that you may post the Bureau and start such measures, information, as you may see your way to do.

"I have begun here. While lying on the Pelican here, as the engine is being overhauled, I have written some thirty letters to parties at different points on Yukon, Tanana, etc., to get signatures to a petition to the Bureau of Fisheries to stand by their order to keep out commercial fishing. I have seen Father Jette at Tanana, and he will write and do his best to thwart the cannery interests. To his surprise, and mine, too, two Roman Catholic priests on the Yukon have signed the cannery petition. This employee is very able, persuasive, and many signed his petition who were camouflaged.

"While too early to speak positively, yet the run of salmon is very small—may be a failure—and all affirm it is due to the cannery which is catching many king salmon—the kind it is after."

The Department of Missions has conferred with the Bureau of Fisheries on the subject. Commissioner Smith is at present in Alaska. The Deputy Commissioner, however, informs the department that no change in the present regulation will be made without a hearing at which all parties at interest may be represented. The exact regulation promulgated on December 18, 1920, which it is now sought to repeal, is as follows:

"On and after September 1, 1921, and until further notice, all fishing for salmon, or other fishing in the prosecution of which salmon are taken or injured, in the Yukon River, its tributaries and lakes, and within 500 yards of each mouth of the Yukon, is prohibited for other than local use in Alaska."

This subject is not at the present time before Congress, and is not likely to come before it in the immediate future. The regulation of December 18, 1920, was promulgated by the Department of Commerce by virtue of authority vested in the Department of Commerce by an act of Congress adopted June 26, 1906. Any change in the present regulation will be promulgated by the Department of Commerce.

Friends of the Alaska Indians may help protect them by requesting their representatives in Congress to express to the Secretary of the Department of Commerce their hope that no change will be made in the regulation of December 18, 1920, concerning salmon fishing on the Yukon.

A MISSION FOR THE SLUM DISTRICT OF TOKYO.

The Rev. P. K. Goto, of the Sitaya Mission, Tokyo, who spent last autumn and winter in the United States, taking post-graduate work at the General Theological Seminary, has returned to Tokyo. Writing three days after his return, he says:

"It is just like a dream and everything looks very strange and queer when compared with New York life. Would you be so kind as to advertise my return and a few words of my thanks for their help, and ask them to send their letters to my address, No. 1, Nakaneigishi, Shitaya, Tokyo, Japan"?

While in this country Mr. Goto received gifts of nearly $8,000, for the purchase of land and the erection of a church, parish house and residence for the Shitaya Mission. The funds which Mr. Goto has on hand in Tokyo bring the total up to $10,000. Recently one friend has promised to give $5,000, providing the remaining $5,000 to make up the total of $20,000 if given by October 31.

Mr. John W. Wood, Executive Secretary of the Department of Missions, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City, will be glad to give information to any friends who may care to help Mr. Goto realize his dream of a properly equipped mission in the slum district of Tokyo, where he lives and works.

WHO WILL HELP?

Miaochien is a village in China. Its name means "Temple Front." It lies at the foot of Chiuhuashan, one of the sacred mountains of China. On the mountain side are many large temples visited annually by thousands of pilgrims. Miaochien is one of the most prosperous out-stations of the city of Anking and the home of a good many zealous Christians. There are now enrolled thirty-three communicants, thirty-five baptized adults, thirteen baptized children, sixty-one catechumens and one hundred and eighty inquirers. Miaochien has given to the Church two catechists, one teacher and one student now in the catechist school.

Bishop Huntington says: "Two years and a half ago, when we made our survey for the Nation-Wide Campaign, we asked for $3,000 to build a chapel, school and residence for the catechist in Miaochien. We have waited hopefully ever since then, but no help has been forthcoming. The congregation has already secured land for the Church and $300 for their building fund. In addition, the last $400 has been promised. The church will cost $2,000.

"Most of the Miaochien Christians are farmers and not at all wealthy. They would be glad to give the full amount for the church themselves if they could. They need that building, and they must have it. The room now used as a church is not nearly large enough to accommodate the Sunday congregation. On a recent Sunday many of the people had to stand and others could not get into the building at all.

"What are we going to do about it? Must we go on telling these people that they cannot have a church? Is it good to keep earnest, generous Christian people like these without the modest church they are pleading for, and for which they have already given generously themselves?"

EPIPHANY SCHOOL, SOOCHOW.

For many years our Church in Shanghai conducted St. Mary's Orphanage. Many a Chinese girl owes to St. Mary's her rescue from a life o fpain and degradation, and her entrance into life full of possibilities and usefulness. Gradually, however, conditions have changed as the altruistic spirit has become more widely disseminated in Eastern China.

An interesting illustration of this is the Widows' Home established by the late Rev. H. W. Woo in a suburb of Shanghai. At this Home orphans are also received. The institution is entirely under the management of a committee composed largely of Chinese, but with the co-operation of a few foreigners such as Bishop Graves.

St. Mary's Orphanage was closed some time ago, and most of the remaining girls were transferred to Epiphany School at Soochow. This, while not enclusively an orphanage, provides a simple Chinese education for girls of all sorts and kinds, especially those from less privileged families. Bishop Graves therefore hopes that all the old friends of St. Mary's will transfer their affection and their aid, given generously and loyally through a long period, to Epiphany School, Soochow. Those who are willing to do this may continue to send their gifts as in the past as specials, but as "specials for Epiphany School, Soochow." As usual, gifts may be sent to the Department of Missions, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

BRAZIL.

The Rev. Dr. James W. Morris writes us from Porto Allegre, July 27:

"We got possession of this splendid property for the Theological School this week. We got it for $10,000, and though some think the price high, I regard it as a bargain. When I got here last year I could not have bought it for less than $20,000; but exchange has gone down and down. and so half that sum does the business.

"We have a good place; over three acres of beautiful grounds, planted in all sorts of fruit trees, and a house that needs very little done to it to give room for ten or twelve students. We are near the school, and so I get the help of the teachers there. We feel that God's answer to our prayers has been wonderful. We want a house full by March 1, 1922; and are praying for ten men here. We have now five. Help us to pray, and ask the brethren to do so. Only so it will be done."

PRAY WITHOUT CEASING.

Bishop Harding, of Washington, has authorized the use of a special prayer in connection with the coming disarmament conference.

Rev. Enoch N. Thompson, of the Chapel of the Nativity, is the author of this prayer, which we publish herewith:

"'Blessed Saviour, Who didst hang upon the cross, stretching forth Thy loving arms in prayer and sacrifice for the world: Grant that all mankind may look unto Thee and be saved. Send Thy blessing upon our nation and upon all the nations of the earth in this new era of reconstruction and peace, and endow the peoples with patience, self-control and kindness.

Bless the conference for disarmament about to assemble, and so guide the deliberations and conclusions of its members that the safety, honor and welfare of all righteous governments may be secured against treachery, hasty violence and warfare: and that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety, may be promoted and established everywhere for all generations.

Finally, we beseech Thee, forgive our sins and forgive the sins of our enemies, and turn their hearts, and grant to us and to the whole world salvation and peace, through Thy mercies and merits, Who livest and reignest with the Father and the Holy Ghost, ever one God, world without end. Amen."

We trust that our bishops throughout the country will follow the example of the Bishop of Washington in authorizing the use of this prayer or of one similar in its object.

This is an opportunity, if ever there was one, for Christian people to be "fervent in prayer."

There can be no doubt that the desires of our Church people and the setting aside of a special Sunday to urge the conference had great weight in determining the administration to take the matter so seriously and carry it forward as far as it has now gone, and we should continue to pray without ceasing, both in public and private, for a happy consummation and for the success of the plans of the conference.

OUR RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE LITTLE ONES.

The question of when a family should be broken up and a mother separated from her children is always one of the most delicate and difficult that presents itself to the social worker.

One of the things that make these cases so difficult is that the maternal instinct is as strong, or at least more apparent, in the depraved and degraded woman as it is in those of a higher type, and at the same time the reasoning faculty is weaker and the altruistic appeal is almost hopeless.

Thus a woman who is totally unfit to rear her own children will make the loudest complaint over being separated from them, because she does not consider their future, and only thinks of her present anguish of heart at the parting.

In all such cases, however, it has been universally held that it is against sound public economy to allow poverty alone to cause the separation of a child from the care of a good mother. This is the principle back of the mothers' pension system, the administration of which is discussed in a report entitled "The Administration of the Aid-to-Mothers Law in Illinois," recently issued by the United States Department of Labor through the Children's Bureau.

The Illinois statute of 1911 was the first mothers' pension law in the country. At present forty States in the Union have such a law.

The administration of the Illinois law of 1911 was placed with the judges of the juvenile courts throughout the State, and very wide discretion was vested in the court. In 1913 the law was radically altered and the authority of the courts was definitely limited. Minor changes have since been made.

During the first year following the enactment of the pension law in Illinois, only sixteen counties outside Cook County made any use of it, while by the end of 1920 pensions were being granted in all but twelve of the one hundred and two counties of the State. At the close of the first year of the administration of the original law, there were three hundred and twenty-seven families on the pension roll of the juvenile court of Cook County, representing a monthly expenditure of almost $7,000, while in November, 1919, there were eight hundred and fifty-one families on the roll with a monthly expenditure more than four times as great as in 1912.

The report gives a detailed account of the administration of the law in Cook County which has set an admirable standard both as to adequacy of pensions and efficiency of administration. The court follows methods standardized by good private relief agencies in the investigation that precedes the pension grant, and also in the supervision of families after they are placed on the pension roll. Aid is administered in such a way as to encourage the self-respect of the beneficiary, and a relationship of co-operation is established between the pensioned mother and the supervising probation officer.

However, methods of administration are diverse throughout the State, and facts presented in the report point to the conclusion that the principle of local responsibility for administration should be replaced by some measure of State control or standardization. The importance of perfecting the mothers' pension law is strongly emphasized because, the report points out, this system, if properly organized and safeguarded, may contain the nucleus of a new form of State aid free from the pauperizing effect of the old public charities, and capable of considerable extension, along with actual economy of expenditure.

Reports on this and kindred subjects can be obtained from the Children's Bureau, United States Department of Labor, Washington, D. C., and they are well worth procuring and studying by Christian social workers throughout our Southern States, where legislation of this nature is sadly lacking. The best test of a law is the way it works where it has already been tried.

All of us who are followers of Him who said, "Let the little ones come unto Me, and forbid them not," have an individual responsibility to see to it that our States do their part toward enabling a worthy mother to rear her own children under proper conditions.

EVANGELIST'S SON TO BECOME PRESIDENT OF MIDDLEBURY COLLEGE.

The Rev. Paul Dwight Moody, younger son of the late Dwight L. Moody, who has been an associate pastor of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, at Seventy-third Street, since July, 1919, will begin his new duties as president of Middlebury College, Middlebury, Vt., on October 1. Mr. Moody was elected to the presidency of the institution several weeks ago.

Mr. Moody was a chaplain with the A. E. F. in France for twenty months beofre taking up his work in this city. He went over as chaplain of the One Hundred and Third Infantry, Twenty-sixth Division, and six months later was called to general headquarters by Bishop Charles Brent, with the approval of General Pershing. Preceding his work with the army, Mr. Moody was for five years pastor of the South Congregational Church, St. Johnsbury, Vt. He also spent a year in the publishing business with his uncle, Fleming H. Revell.

Many of us, like the man in the parable, do not see how empty our cupboards are until a friend "comes to us from a journey," and then our barren uselessness, our ill-equipped spirits, our meagre souls shame us.—Fosdick.

The Rev. F. B. Drane Appointed Archdeacon of the Yukon.

The Bishop of Alaska has appointed the Rev. Frederick B. Drane Archdeacon of the Yukon, as successor to the late Archdeacon Stuck. Mr. Drane, having served six continuous years in Alaska, is leaving on furlough for one year for his home in North Carolina.

Wins Diploma in Teacher Training Course.

The Standard Course in Teacher Training is seldom accomplished in less than three years of good, solid work. It is, therefore, a matter of Church interest to chronicle the receipt of diplomas in this course. The Department of Religious Education has just granted a diploma to Miss Margaret M. French, of Marion, Mass.

"Diocesan Days."

From August 15 to 26, inclusive, there were observed in the Diocese a series of diocesan days. Each department of the Church's work was presented. These gatherings were for the purpose of conference and general study of the field and for a consideration of methods of service. They were also designed as a means of bringing the people together for a larger acquaintance with one another. It is believed that this occasion will accomplish a great deal towards putting the entire personnel of the Diocese behind its work.

The places at which the diocesan days were observed were Christiansburg, Graham, Dante, Big Stone Gap, Bristol, Wytheville, Martinsville, Bedford, Buchanan and Clifton Forge. Large and enthusiastic gatherings greeted the speakers. Those who composed the party who made this most interesting itinerary for the first week were the Rev. Messrs. Karl Morgan Block, W. B. Lee, Jr., Churchill Gibson and Devall Gwathmey. The party for the second week was composed of the Rev. Messrs. W. B. Lee, Jr., Karl M. Block, B. D. Chambers and T. D. Lewis. The Bishop was present a part of each day and had the closing service at night. It is planned to repeat this program at a number of places this fall.

The Bishop recently visited Trinity Church, Boonsboro, and Ivy Chapel, near Coffee, Bedford County. At Trinity he confirmed a class of ten persons, presented by the rector, the Rev. Thomas Howell. In the class were father, son and grandson. God has greatly prospered Mr. Howell in his ministry. He is greatly beloved by his people and is honored and appreciated by the whole Diocese.

The Rev. M. Paul S. Huntington has entered upon his duties as minister in charge at Norton, Wise County. Mr. Huntington will also have charge of the work at Big Stone Gap and adjacent points during the absence of the Rev. Edgar C. Burnz, deacon, who will spend one year in special study at the Virginia Theological Seminary. Mr. Huntington's coming makes the ninth clergyman who has accepted work in the Diocese since its organization less than two years ago.

The Rev. G. Otis Mead, rector of Christ Church, Roanoke, has declined the call recently extended him to the Church of the Ascension, Baltimore.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Grace Church, Walker's Parish.

Though one of the old churches of the Diocese, Grace Church has had few rectors, the Rev. E. Boyden having been in charge for forty years, and the Rev. E. V. Jones for twenty. The latter is still much beloved by his former congregation, and some of the older ones still hold the former in high esteem. Between these two, the Rev. Robert White, Sr., and the Rev. E. L. Goodwin, D. D., served for four years each, most acceptably. Since 1910 the Rev. F. L. Robinson has been in charge, working most indefatigably and acceptably, not only at Grace Church and St. John's, Louisa, but also at St. Andrew's Chapel, Stony Point, and at several other missionary places, holding sometimes three services each Sunday, though they are quite a distance apart. Recently he and his people have been helped and encouraged by a mission held by the Rev. W. D. Smith, of Richmond. He preached every night for a week to interested and appreciative congregations. On August 24 Bishop Brown visited the church for confirmation and gave a most helpful address. Under the leadership of Mrs. J. B. Dickinson, there has been for several months a large vested choir, which much improves the music and adds to the dignity of the service.

The Rev. Alexander Galt has accepted the call extended to him by the vestry of Upper Truro Parish, including Herndon and Chantilly. After October 1 his address will be Herndon, Va.

The address of the Rev. B. N. de F. Wagner, rector of Christ Church, Richmond, is changed from 2100 East Clay Street to 2804 East Broad Street, the latter having been bought by the church for a rectory.

The Rev. S. E. Prentiss, who recently resigned as rector of St. Martin's Parish, Hanover County, is leaving this month for his new field.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Service to King Peter of Serbia in Washington Cathedral Is Largely Attended.

An event of unusual interest and significance in the history of the Washington Cathedral occurred on Friday afternoon, September 2, when a service of requiem to King Peter of Serbia was held according to the rites of the Greek Orthodox Church. Since there was no priest of the Serbian National Church, which is in communion with the Greek Orthodox Church, available for the services, they were conducted by the Rev. Thomas Daniels, pastor of the Greek Church of St. Helena and St. Constantine in the city of Washington. Rev. Mr. Daniels was assisted by a layman from his parish church. The use of the Bethlehem Chapel was cordially accorded to the Legation of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes by the Bishop of Washington, and the legation had full charge of the arrangements. In accordance with the custom of the Greek Church, all seats were removed from the chapel and all those attending stood during the entire service. The catafalque near the chancel was covered with beautiful wreaths sent by President and Mrs. Harding, Secretary and Mrs. Hughes, the Greeks of Washington and the Serbians of Washington.

Three Episcopal clergymen in their robes were also in the chancel, namely, the Rev. George F. Dudley, D. D., President of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Washington, representing the Bishop of the Diocese; the Rev. William L. DeVries, Ph. D. D. D., canon residentiary of the Washington Cathedral, and the Rev. H. Allen Griffith, Secretary of the Diocese of Washington. The only music of the service consisted of two organ solos beautifully rendered by Mr. Edgar Priest, Cathedral organist. They were Funeral March by Chopin, played at the beginning of the service, and Dead March from Saul, by Handel, used as a recessional.

A flag of the United States and one of Serbia, standing on either side of the altar, formed the only decorations. President and Mrs. Harding were present at the service, and also many others distinguished in official and diplomatic life in Washington, including the Secretary of State and Mrs. Hughes, Admiral Coontz, representing the Secretary of the Navy; representatives of the Secretaries of War, Commerce and Interior; Baron Shidehara, Ambassador of Japan, and members from all the legations in Washington. Officers of the United States Army and Navy acted as ushers at the service and special escort to the President.

At the conclusion of the service the President of the United States expressed his condolences to M. Taditch, who, in the name of King Alexander, thanked the President for attending the service. This service, especially unique as it was, emphasized very strongly the spirit of unity which exists between the Greek and Anglican Churches, and was at once important for that reason in the life of the Church.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan-Elect.

Bishop Lloyd and Dr. Silver Return from an Interesting Vacation.

Bishop Lloyd and the Rev. Dr. Horace Percy Silver have just returned from a vacation trip to the North Cape, and from an airplane journey from Paris to London.

"The scene from the top of the North Cape was, I think, the most beautiful I have ever seen in my life," said Dr. Silver. "We had been at sea in a fog that lasted nine days, although it was light the entire twenty-four hours, and it was possible to read on deck all night if we wanted to. It was rather hard to tell when it was time to go to bed. It was still foggy when we reached the cape. A cruder place you could not imagine. It was nature at its wildest. We climbed 1,100 feet to the top of the cape over snow and ice, and reached there about 1 o'clock in the morning. Just then the fog rolled back as if a curtain had been drawn aside, and we could look out over that great northern wilderness, the midnight sun shining on it and making a glory and beauty and play of color that will remain in my memory as long as I live.

"From there we went down the coast of Norway, a magnificent coast, the scenery of which is, I think, superior to that of any spot in the world. I have visited many of the places famous for their grandeur and beauty, but I think the coast of Norway is unrivaled. I remember one little harbor, that of Merok, where it seemed impossible to get out. The narrow passage was hidden by the great cliffs that encircled the bay, and we lay there as if in a mighty cup in the mountains. It was like another world.

"From there we went to some of the continental countries, and the more I saw the more I gave the Lord thanks that I was born in America. America is a place apart. One realizes that after seeing these war-torn countries of the Old World, and even in those that were not devastated the contrast is forcible. Holland was busy and booming, Belgium is doing well, and France seems to be working hard and hiding her sufferings fairly well.

"But London seemed to me pathetic. It didn't look the same. There were so many people on the streets out of work. They haven't been able to do much to recover, and they have some almost overwhelming problems. They were not marked by war as France is, but the suffering of the soul seemed to be greater. People seemed to be working harder on the continent than in England also, and there is much misunderstanding. They do not seem to realize that their work is not altogether for themselves, but for the nation, and that the nation's work is for the world. In the south of England, also, there has been a heavy drought, and the grass, which usually is so green, is brown and burned by the sun. The north of England looks pretty good. Taxes there are terrific. The average person pays 6 shillings taxes out of every pound received. Six out of twenty! Think what it would mean if every person getting $20 in this country were taxed $6 of it.

"Perhaps the most fascinating experience we had was in flying from Paris to London in a small four-seated plane. We had an unusual trip. The time is usually two and a half hours, but we had a head-on sixty-five mile gale which forced the pilot to rise 6.000 feet to get above it, and the view from a mile up was magnificent. It took us four hours to make the journey because of the wind. The fare is very reasonable, only about $10 more than the railway fare."

Bishop Lloyd, who said he never felt better in his life, was also enthusiastic over the airplane trip.

"Every one should fly," he said "The sensation is wonderful, and I have returned an enthusiast for the extension of airplane service. If you have not taken an air trip you have missed a treat."

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Coadjutor.

Two Important Days.

October 4 and 5 will be important days for this Diocese. On the 4th, at Trinity in Columbia, will be held an institute for leaders of parish conferences on the Nation-Wide Campaign. The fall Missionary Convention will be held the day following at the same place, and interesting programs have been arranged for both days. The two meetings, though distinct, are logically held together, and conveniently so. It is hoped that there will be a strong representation from each parish and mission, including the rector and some Nation-Wide Campaign leaders, to attend for both days. The Executive Council will also meet on October 5.

The great event of this fall is the celebration of the Centennial of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Church on November 6. The endeavor will be to make the celebration one not in "word only, but in deed"—in other words, the ideal of service set up by the Church a hundred years ago is to be taken as an inspiration for actual accomplishment today.

The meetings in Columbia are planned to furnish the keynote not for the fall's work alone, but for that of the entire year following—and not only the keynote, but a definite outline plan of work.—The Diocese.

The Rev. William Hoke Ramsaur and his wife made a short tour of this Diocese in the latter part of August. On August 19 they addressed a splendid congregation of both white and colored churchmen in St. Luke's Colored Church on Hampton Street, Columbia. The Rev. and Mrs. Ramsaur will be the missionary speakers at the Diocesan Missionary Convention, which will be held in Columbia, in Trinity Church, on October 5.

FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. E G. Weed, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Weed Takes Needed Rest.

Owing to poor health and impaired eyesight, the Bishop of the Diocese of Florida, the Rt. Rev. Edwin Gardner Weed, D. D., has turned over to the Standing Committee the care and administration of the Diocese, until such time as his health and eyesight are restored. Business communications for the Diocese of Florida should therefore be addressed to the Rev. L. Fitz-James Hindry, Secretary of the Standing Committee, Trinity Parish, St. Augustine, Fla.

WYOMING

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop.

News Notes of Interest.

On July 31 the remains of Sergeant Archie L. Hay were interred at Rock Springs. Archie Hay was the son of John W. Hay, Treasurer of the Cathedral Chapter of the Missionary District of Wyoming. He was killed in the Argonne offensive on September 27, 1918. His remains were brought from France, together with those of Private Joseph Milburne, of Rock Springs, and the funeral services were read simultaneously, those for Sergeant Hay at the Church of the Holy Communion, and those for Private Milburne at the Congregational Church. The processions then formed into one cortege, and "taps" were sounded over the graves of the two comrades.

Interested women of Jackson have formed themselves into a Hospital Auxiliary and are rendering efficient aid to St. John's Hospital.

The Wyoming Clericus will meet at Bishopstowe, in Cheyenne, from September 29 to October 5 inclusive, immediately after the meeting of the Provincial Synod in Denver.

Deaconess Virginia C. Young, of No. 17 Beekman Place, New York, has given her summer vacation to Wyoming, and has done marvelous work in the mining town of Hanna. She has visited every home in the town and has organized a flourishing Sunday school and Bible class.

WESTERN MICHIGAN

Rt. Rev. J. N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop.

St. Luke's Church, Kalamazoo: New Rector Takes Charge.

The Rev. James H. Bishop, rector of St. Paul's, Dowagiac, entered upon his duties as rector of St. Luke's, Kalamazoo, September 1. St. Luke's is the third largest parish in the Diocese of Western Michigan, and is second to none in the completeness and beauty of its equipment, possessing a beautiful church and chapel, a large and elegant parish house and a fine rectory. The Rev. Mr. Bishop is no stranger to the people, having served under the Rev. B. F. P. Ivins, the retiring rector, for two and a half years as curate, organist and choir master and Scout Master. For several months he was in entire charge while Mr. Ivins was in the war service as chaplain, and is thus called back by Church people who know him well, admire and love him.

Mr. Bishop's work at Dowagiac has been marvelously blessed. Taking up the young parish in March, 1919, after the excellent start made by his predecessor, the Rev. John Wilkins, the following are some of the visible results of his labors. The church, formerly owned and used by Universalists, has been thoroughly remodeled and enlarged by the addition of a chancel, the towers have been rebuilt, new pews, new stained windows and a bell installed, and the whole tastefully decorated. A comfortable rectory adjoining the church has been bought and a spacious parish house erected. The cost of the new work adds up to some fifteen thousand dollars, and is all paid for, the cost of the rectory alone remaining to be raised. In the two and a half years of the rectorship one hundred and twelve persons have been confirmed and one hundred and nine baptized. The membership of the parish has grown from eighty to one hundred and eighty.

Mr. Bishop's successor at Dowagiac has already been secured in the person of the Rev. Roy R. Fairchild, of St. Mary's Church, Nebraska City.

F. O. G.

Wherever ministers of the Gospel have preached Christ and Him crucified, and have indoctrinated the people, their pews have been filled, and their ministry has been honored of God. Wherever they have preached philosophy, and the social program, made by pharisees and unregenerated parasites, they have found death in the pews and cobwebs in their church building. No minister nor church can prosper when God and His infallible Word, vicarious atonement and blessed return have been left out of the preaching. History proves the truthfulness of that statement.—Dr. M. A. Matthews.

The Prophet.

The mantled prophet stands with arms outstretched,
His arms aflame, his muscles tense as steel.
His words, which reach him from the lips of God,
Break on the ear as breaks the thunderpeal:
"Cease from the path of sin. Turn ye to God,
How will ye rob the poor and wrong the just?
Turn to Jehovah, yet may He forgive.
The day of God draws near; all flesh is dust."

The people hear his words, but little heed;
The ear is heavy and the heart is dead.
The voice of God in them no echo stirs,
It wakes but anger and a sense of dread;
"Why should we care, is not life good and sweet?
Gold buys its pleasures, fame may come with years,
Love pours its treasures at its loved ones' feet.
Why this stern call to penitence and tears?"

"'Nay," cries the prophet, "but the judgment comes;
The day of God comes as a thief at night.
The Temple that ye trust in shall not save.
Your sole salvation is to love the right.
Then, ah! Jehovah, if but this ye do
Ye shall return as waters in the spring,
And He, the Lord of Hosts, shall keep you safe,
And round about you arms of mercy fling!

"The Temple shall not save? Jehovah's house?
What words are these we hear this fellow cry?
Cursed be the tongue that speaks this blasphemy.
Stone him to death who dares to speak this lie!
Our sins, indeed? He calls us to account,
We who so zealously have served the Lord.
Off with this madman, let him die the death,
Who dares to think his ravings are God's word!"
They have their will. The prophet's lips are sealed.
Sin runs its course unheeded, undismayed.
Only the sound of groaning by the wheel,
Only the cry of slave by master flayed,
Only the mother weeping for her child,
Only the husband's cry for his loved wife,
Only such bitter sounds as these rebuke!
In justice making sport of human life!

Then, like the lightning, at Jehovah's nod
Falls on the land the naked sword of God!

At St. Mary's Hall.

"It is what you do when you leave school that counts," might in the words of the Columbia song, "be deep graven on each heart" at St. Mary's Hall, Shanghai, for the girl's hear them very often. On just that, what students are five or ten years after graduation, the reputation of any school in large measure depends. Unfortunately, there is nothing harder to gage with any exactness than such statistics. Our girls are scattered all over, from Peking to Singopore, and in America and Europe. We can know which are married and which teaching, perhaps, but what stand for better things are they taking in their communities, how are they carrying the influence of St. Mary's into their homes and to other less fortunate women?

Now and then we have had a little glimpse from a distance. A father came down from the North and gave as a reason for bringing his two big wholesome-looking daughters to us that he had met one of our graduates and wanted his girls to be like that. During the past year or two we have made some little attempt to follow these graduates, and, quite aware that in giving any figures we are making many mistakes of omission, we wish to share with friends in America a new source of encouragement in our work.

Of the Alumnae with whom we are closely enough in touch to know, we have found that forty-five have done some sort of voluntary Church or social service work during the past year. This may mean daily work such as the hour a day that two girls are giving to St. Elizabeth's Hospital, or the weekly teaching of Sunday-school, or it may mean the Christmas party to which Mrs. S. S. Yang and her husband invited one hundred and fifty children from the villages near their lovely home. In Shanghai there is a group of girls who meet occasionally to make surgical dressings for the different hospitals. It will be possible next fall, I hope to find one girl who can get the gauze from the hospital, take it about to young women who are tied down to their homes but glad to have some useful occupation, and then see that it gets back again. (A not impossible successor to Red Cross work, it would seem, in some places at home as well.) This same group provided for the Christmas at St. Elizabeth's this winter, giving a present to each patient, and training a play which the nurses acted for all those who were able to sit up in bed and enjoy it.

In Wusih they have formed a "School Friend Society" of some twenty St. Mary's students who live there, with two of the Alumnae for officers. Their plan is to meet at the Mission twice a year for a tiffin party, and we hope they may prove to be a body of educated young women to whom Miss Hammond may appeal for help in such emergencies as this year's Famine Relief. Christian and non-Christian can work together in public service. Wusih has fostered another girl's club this winter, organized by a last year's graduate who gives part of her time to Church work there. It is patriotic in character and made up of non-Christions, several of them young married women who wanted some better way of passing the time than in gambling and gossip.

When the returns for the woman's Auxiliary are sent in each year we find some of our girls among the officers, others give part time to teaching in the Mission day schools, one is on the vestry of St. Peter's Church, Shanghai, and has organized a personal worker's group in the Junior Auxiliary of which she is president. In Nanking, one graduate has been holding in her own home a weekly discussion class for girls from the Government Normal School who were interested in Christianity. A day spent with the wife of the Chinese clergyman in Hsiakwan, brought out one by one the following list of things she was doing:

1. In charge of the girls' day school.
2. Teaching English and singing in the girls' school. Teaching singing in the boys school.
3. Vice-President and Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary. (another St. Mary's Alumna is President)
4. Translating the life of Sadhu Sundar Singh into Chinese.
5. Visits the women of the parish and the mothers of school children two afternoons a week.
6. Has a girls' club on Saturdays—40 members.
7. Translates the Christian Nurture Series lessons and stories, instructs the Sunday-school teachers and superintends the Sunday-school.
8. Plays the organ at all services.
9. Had preached to an audience of two hundred, principaly men, in an open-air evangelistic meeting the week before.

"Now," I said, "you've given me nine things. Can you make it ten?" "Ten? Oh! yes, ten, I have a baby." And she has a ten months' old baby! "This all sounds like boasting" she objected, but was satisfied with the reply that she must think of it as a report to her "mother school," as they all love to call it. "At first" she went on, "I did all my own housework, but my husband said, 'Don't waste five dollars' worth of time on a five-cent job. Get a servant and be free to do Church work."

One girl, as yet unbaptised, feels that her missionary call is to her own family, and through her influence what was a typical high class heathen household of quarreling wives and children, gambling, and objectless lives, has grown to have the "feel" of a Christian home. Her mother has raised the other two wives to an equal position with herself (these are ways of doing this in China), her father has built a new home near an excellent primary school with a Christian Principal so that there is no excuse for depriving any one of the children of a good education. Smoking and gambling have been put an end to in the women's quarters, and in the summer the children teach a free school to which the wives give equal support. Last year she and her brother became worried about the future of some distant nephews and nieces, and at China New Year went on a difficult trip up country to investigate, proudly bringing home ten children to be placed in a good Christian school. In spite of all this her father still refuses to allow her to be baptised. She has considered taking the responsibility on her own shoulders, but decided against that, saying, "My bastism is not going to be done secretly, as though I were ashamed of it. It must be something that the whole family will feel as an honor, and they are all going to be there to see it."

One could go on enumerating many more instances, but this will be sufficient to show that our girls are realizing the responsibility of their privileges. We have a St. Mary's Alumnae Service Flag, white with a blue star for every girl who is doing some voluntary work. One young "Alumna husband," as we call them, when I told him of it, said "All St. Mary's girls are stars, and some of them," looking at his wife, 'are planets."

I Am the Way.

I am the Way!
Lo, as of old one voice is ever speaking;
Yet, all t he day,
Still earnest souls another way are seeking.

Who, save the Son,
Our condemnation in is body bearing—
With us made one—
Our likeness in His Father's presence wearing—

Oh who, save He,
Could lead us safely through this night of sadness,
With Him to be,
Through an eternity of rest and gladness?

Lord, we have heard
Thou art the Way, and in Thyself confiding,
We trust Thy Word,
We trust ourselves in all things to Thy guiding.

—E. H. Divall.

Eternal Life in the Present.

Too often is eternal life regarded as the reward of a life of active virtue, as the far off hope which stimulates the fainting heart to "patient continuance in well doing"; too often is it supposed that only when the battle is over and the victory won shall we pass beneath the dark gateway of death into the bright peace of the heavenly Kingdom. But on the other hand, the herald of Christ came with the cry, "The Kingdom of heaven is at hand," a cry which Christ Himself confirmeth by proclaiming to His hearers, "The Kingdom of God is come nigh unto you." Eternal life, then, is not set before the world as the prize of patient purity, the reward of long continued well-doing, or the stimulus to excite men to a life of holiness. It is not a glory which only after death will crown the successful endeavors of the faithful; it is the purity, the well-doing, the holiness itself. It is the knowledge of God and Christ, with all the spiritual virtues which attend it—Knowledge which, if the rational nature of man be no delusion, may be ours now; virtues which, if the life of Christ have any significance, if His blessed example and exhortations, have any meaning for us, may adorn our present earthly life. —A. Semple.

Vacation.

While we live our proper place is in the world of struggle. To withdraw from it, and, hermit-like, spend our years in some quiet far-away nook, "the world forgetting, by the world forgot," is a cowardly dereliction of duty. I have no right to live except as a man among men. When I crawl away into some remote hole and "let the rest of the world go by," the rights of man are no longer mine.

Still, there is a suggestion of weariness about the majority of us. The faces we meet in the street, hot with the heat of the summer day, are lined with the signs that we are over-done. In this year of grace, 1921, humanity's pulse is racing and its temperature is high. Speed is the supreme merit. The thing done is of more moment than the doer of it. The mind of the Master is reversed, for meat is more than life, and raiment than the body.

How natural is it, therefore, that about the time when the berries come, we long for the Great Shepherd to lead us away from the noise and strife to the green pastures and still waters where the soul is restored and the body rebuilt.

We owe it to ourselves and our friends that we thus re-create ourselves. If we do not relinquish the whirl for a while we are likely to grow hard while we think we are becoming cleverer, and bitter while we think we are growing more capabe.

It can fittingly be said of many a man in July: "George should take his vacation. He is getting hyper-critical and cynical. If he would lock up his desk and go into the pines and catch trout, and forget men and things for a month, he would become lovable again." "All work and no play" diminishes faith, clips the wings of hope and shrivels up chivalry. We become coarser in grain, and lose that tone which makes our friends glad to see us coming down the street, and the children happy when we are in the house.

The laborer in Christ's vineyard inevitably gets dispirited.

It is hard to work for God
To rise and take His part
Upon this battle field of earth,
And not sometimes lose heart.

It is difficult not to grow weary of the slow progress of the cause to which we have devoted our all; and tired of the endless "teeter-totter" of hope and disillusion, of faith and the bafflement of honest endeavor; until aspiration gets blunted and we begin to question the supreme necessity of "Carrying on."

There was a band of men who were in the same state of mind in Christ's day. When John the Baptist had been beheaded and his disciples had reverently buried his body, they went in their dispirited disappointment to Jesus. He met with them: "Come ye yourself apart into a desert place and rest awhile." And he went with them away from the din and doing of men.

Now we cannot think of Christ withdrawing from men except for the purpose of fitting Himself for further service. The strain of service led Him to seek the silences, and the silences fitted Him to minister once again to the multitude on which he had compassion. It is good for the lives which touch ours that, when the strain has weakened us, we indulge our thirst for a short existence in exquisite places, commune with the very spring of life, and walk and talk with God in His garden.

And then, when we come back, just before "the frost is on the punkin," to the old desk and the old home, we shall be more tender, larger, freer, lighter, and manifest a finer energy and grace.—Wyoming Churchman.

To Love Is Not Always to Understand.

There is nothing a child appreciates more than to be understood.

The years of childhood are so few that we should make the most of them by studying the nature of each individual child and deal with it accordingly.

Oh, yes, we all feel that we love our children, but that love should prompt us to fully understand them.

One little girl remarked about a grown up friend, "I just love her, she is such an understandingest person." Children cannot convey their ideas as they wish. With a little close attention and imagination we can quickly decipher what they mean to say. This is always greatly appreciated.

What bitter impressions still linger in our minds of times when our elders ridiculed us simply because they failed even to try to understand. Ridicule is often felt more keenly by a child than one who is older. Then, too, who is there among us who would not condemn most vociferously the threatening of a child to force it into subjection or the laughing at its fears? I have heard mothers threaten their children by telling them that this or that would happen to them, or that some fearful goblin would appear if they were not quiet or go to sleep. Then the child usually has a restless sleep and wakens in a feverish condition. The one in charge surely failed even to try to understand the sensitive nature of little one. They cannot expect to be trusted or regarded as truthful when the menaces fail to appear.

The great secret of understanding children lies in the closer contact with them, the sharing of their plans, their thoughts, their talks, their pleasures, and their very lives.—Selected.

Bobby's Prayer.

Dear Father, there's the other boy to-night,
Who's praying to a god that's made of wood;
He asks it to take care of him till light
And love him—but it won't do any good.

He is so far I cannot make him hear;
I'd call to him and tell him, if I could,
That You'll take care of him, that You are near
And love him—for his god is made of wood.

I know he'd ask You if he only knew;
I know he'd love to know You if he could.
Dear God, take care of him, and love him, too—
The other boy, whose god is made of wood.

Orders Are Orders.

"I wish I was grown up and didn't have to mind anyone!" sighed Edward Bruce Taylor, alias Ned, crossly, as he took a fresh grip on his new sail-boat. It's just the day to sail her and here I am all ready to wade in, and I have to stay on the bank because I had the croup last night. It makes me mad!" and Ned dug his toe savagely into the soft grass.

"What's the matter, Captain?" called Uncle Ben cheerfully as he pushed aside the bushes. "Ship on the rocks?" Better take the skipper aboard and shove her off."

A faint smile played around Ned's mouth at this remark, then quickly disappeared as his disappointment came into mind.

"It wouldn't do a bit of harm to wade in the brook with my boat, would it, Uncle Ben? The water is as warm as toast."

"Had reverse orders?" asked Uncle Ben quicky.

"Well, mother thought it might be too cold, as I had the croup last night; but I'm sure she'd let me if you asked her. Do, Uncle Ben!" cried Ned coaxingly.

"See here, Captain, I never ask anyone to change orders; it's dangerous business. When I'm told to do a thing, or not to do it, I mind."

"You mind, Uncle Ben? I never heard of a man minding, and you're so old, too! I heard mother say you were thirty and that all the girls were crazy about you. Are they, Uncle Ben?"

"I'm sure I hope not; they'd be foolish if they were. But let's get back to the subject of minding, Captain. You just make it a rule to obey orders every time and it's bound to keep you out of trouble. It won't always be easy, but it makes you happier in the end. While we are on the subject of obeying orders, which means the same thing as minding, suppose I tell you a little experience that I had. Maybe it will help you.

"It was a cold, snowy day in the middle of December a year ago. The destroyer of which I was commanding officer was slipping through the water off the Irish coast turned toward home. That meant that we would be through our work of searching for submarines and would be relieved by other men.

"We were perhaps half way to port, and I was in my stateroom thinking what a splendid Christmas I would spend with you, little Captain, when orders came by wireless that we were to head about and proceed at full speed to meet a large troop-ship that was on her way to France with several thousand men aboard. The orders stated that she was guarded by five destroyers, but that we were to join her also.

"Well, I felt just as you did. Neddy boy, mad clean through! I talked to myself just as you did, too. I said, 'Why should we go after that ship when she has five destroyers protecting her?' But orders are orders with men as well as with boys, so I gave the order and we headed about and started in the teeth of a northeaster, which had been blowing up for the last hour or two.

"After several hours of pretty rough sailing, we sighted the troop-ship. Two of the destroyers were protecting the bow of the ship; one on the side and two at the stern; we were to take our place on the unprotected side. For the next few hours things were pretty quiet, no danger sighted when suddenly the man in the 'lookout' shouted: 'Submarine off the starboard bow, sir, just coming to surface.' Instantly the men came to action and jumped to their stations. The forward gun swung around to bear upon the submarine and at the command, 'Fire at will,' spoke its challenge to the enemy. Several shots were fired, and then as the submarine began to submerge we dropped several depth-charges, with the result that the submarine was blown nearly clear of the water.

"Now, Neddy boy, you see what happened because I obeyed orders, even though I thought my own way was the best. We saved the ship and, what was even more important, the lives of several thousand soldiers with her."

"Oh, Uncle Ben, that was wonderful! I'll try to remember next time what you say, that 'Orders are orders and must be obeyed.'"

"Even though it means keeping on land when you'd rather be in the water," laughed Uncle Ben, then added with a touch of reverence, "Don't you remember, Ned, even Jesus was subject to Joseph and Mary?"—American Messenger.

The Voyage of the Plush Cat.

Amy and Robert Chase were standing in the west window to look up and down the brook which flowed close to the house. Long rains had made the water so high that it was exciting to watch it and try to count the barrels, boxes and logs as they went rushing along on the swift current.

"But we mustn't forget the telephone," Amy reminded her brother. "There it goes now, Robert, and it's your turn to answer."

The two children felt that they were in charge of the house all this week while father and mother were away—though to be sure there was Katie in the kitchen and John Bird to take care of things at the barn.

The telephone was out in the hall and Robert came back laughing when he had answered it.

"It was one of the Rowland kids," he explained. (There were five of the Rowlands and they lived three miles up the bank of the brook.) "They say Baby Bee has lost that famous plush cat of hers."

Amy laughed too as she remembered how the littlest Rowland girl, aged four, always carried that plush cat everywhere, even to bed.

"Baby Bee will cry her eyes out," Amy stopped laughing as she thought about it. "How did she lose it, Rob?"

"Minnie said it went off down the brook. Seems they had made a house-boat out of a box to sail their dolls in, and Bee stuffed the plush cat into it while it was standing on the shore waiting to be launched. Then they all went off for something, and while they were gone the water rose and carried off the boat-house, plush cat and all."

"Let's go out on the bridge and see if we can't catch it as it comes along," proposed Amy.

"It may not come back for a week," objected Rob. "I told Minnie so. It'll keep getting stuck in the bushes aong the shore, or it may get smashed by a log or something, and never be heard from again."

However, they went out to the bridge, which was not far off from the house. It was a stout little bridge, and John Bird said there was no danger of its being carried off, even though the water was so high that it touched the planks. Amy and Robert stood in the middle of it and looked up-stream where a little of almost everything seemed to be coming down. But they saw no such thing as a toy house-boat with a plush cat in it.

"Guess Baby Bee will never see that cat again," remarked Robert. "They'll have to make her another one. What's a plush cat anyway, when they've got four or five live kittens waiting to be given to the neighbors!"

Amy and Robert had been hoping for more than a week for a chance to go up to the Rowland place and get a snow-white kitten Minnie had promised them. The two little Chases had no pet of any kind and, as Amy said, they needed one dreadfully all this lonesome week while mother and father were away. But the rains had washed out the road so that there was no prospect of getting that kitten for days to come.

"Bee likes the plush cat best," Amy explained. "You know how babies take a fancy to such things, and it's safer for her to play with than a live kitten. It won't scratch when she squeezes it too hard."

They gave up watching for the house-boat and went back to the house. Minnie called up again and told them that Bee was crying bitterly for her plush cat.

"I do wish you could spy that house-boat," said Minnie. "If we could just tell the baby that you've saved the plush cat from drowning and will take care of it for her, she would think it was all right. The little thing cries so we can't have any fun at all, and mother isn't here to help us."

"They're keeping house all alone just as we are," Amy reminded her brother. "We ought to do what we can for them. Look here, Rob, let's take our luncheon and go out on the bridge and camp there till night. Then if the house-boat does come along we can't help seeing it."

Robert laughed at this and then he began to look rather cross. There were many things he would have liked better to do than sit all day on a bridge half-day across a brook. But he went, and they sat there in the sun and ate their luncheon as they watched the water.

"It's pleasant enough here," Amy declared as cheerfully as she could. 'But time seems so long when you're waiting for something that I thought I'd bring the dominoes, Rob. Let's sit down here in the middle of the bridge and have a game."

They sat there for the greater part of the afternoon playing dominoes and watching for the plush cat to come sailing down the brook.

"That house-boat is hung up on a snag or sunk in midstream by a head-on collision—that's my opinion—say, what's that?"

Something had come into sight on the swift current above them. It was shaped like a box, but it had tiny windows cut in the sides and it was flying a little scarlet pennant from the top of a small wooden staff.

"It's the house-boat—hurrah, we've got it!" Rob had laid hold of the box and lifted it carefully over the railing to the floor of the bridge.

"Look here, Amy," he cried, "can a plush cat yow! that way?"

For there certainly came from the inside of the box such a sound as only cats in distress can make.

They took off the box cover which formed the roof of the house-boat. There lay the plush cat, filling almost all the space inside the box. But underneath Amy spied two bright eyes and two white paws.

"O, Robert," she gasped, "it's our very own kitten."

Sure enough it was. The little creature had climbed into the "boat" while it was standing on the shore, and the baby had put the plush cat in and capped the cover on, without noticing the kitten asleep at the bottom of the box.

"It isn't hurt a bit," cried Amy, cuddling the fluffy white ball against her cheek. "Let's run and telephone to Minnie that the first voyage of her house-boat is a great success."—Mabel S. Merrill, in Zion's Herald.

How Trixie Earned Her Lunch Bones.

Trixie was a lovely white silky-haired dog with the cutest little black spot on each ear, and the tip of her ever-friendly wagging tail and she was the beloved pet of a little girl named Priscilla. Now Trixie often went to the store when Priscilla accompanied her mother and it happened one day when Trixie went along the kind-hearted butcher man, seeing the friendly lettle dog looking longingly at the meat, yet never offering to touc hanything, threw her the end of a soup bone.

To the butcher man's surprise, Trixie gave a delighted little bark, which said, "Thank you" as plainly as any dog could say it.

"That's quite a smart little dog you've got there," the butcher man said to Priscilla. "What's her name?"

"Her name's Trixie," Priscilla answered, "and she's tricky, too."

"I can well believe that," the butcher man laughed.

"Would you like to see her do some stunts?" asked Priscilla.

"Come around to-morrow about noon," the butcher man answered. "I won't be quite so busy then."

So the next day Priscilla took Trixie along with her to the butcher man's place, and when the dog had performed a number of cute litle tricks the butcher man gave her a nice, rich, juicy bone.

That was how it happened that every day about noon a little white dog with a black spot on each ear and the tip of her tail would enter a meat market, and standing on her hind feet with her paws propped against the counter, would give a little bark to attract the butcher man's attnetion and beg with her gentle brown eyes while she waited for the bone which she never failed to receive.

"You're about the nicest little dog there is," the butcher man declared, as he gave Trixie the end of a juicy bone, and Trixie never forgot her "thank you" bark as she picked up the bone and trotted off in the direction of home.

When Priscilla saw Trixie coming home the first time all by herself with a fresh bone in her mouth, the little girl ran laughing to her mother.

"Mamma," she said, "Trixie has learned to go after her own lunch bones."

"I'm afraid Trixie is becoming a nuisance at the meat shop," Mrs. Deveny replied. "I'll have to see the butcher man about it."

So the next day when Priscilla and her mother went to the meat market they decided to keep the dog at home, but Trixie slyly slipped out the back door and beat them to the shop, and to their great surprise, when they entered the shop they found Trixie at her accustomed place by the counter, waiting patiently for the bone, which she always received.

"I fear that dog's making you a lot of trouble," Mrs. Deveny said to the butcher man.

"Not at all, ma'am," he assured her. "She's a dog in a thousand, for I can go out and leave her alone and she never touches a thing—she really earns her bones by her nice, polite ways."

A True St. Bernard Story.

This St. Bernard lived in Switzerland. His name was Santo and he belonged to an innkeeper up in the mountains. One wild, stormy night when he was lying by the hearth-fire apparently asleep, and his master and mistress were taking their ease because they knew no guests would come on such a night. Santo suddenly jumped up and insisted on going out. His master tried to dissuade him saying: "No, Santo, you do not want to go out such a terrible night as this; see how the snow drifts and how the wind blows!" But Santo grew much excited and in spite of all persuasion got out and started down the mountain road as fast as he could go and as if he knew exactly where he was going.

About two hours later he returned, almost exhausted with a baby lashed to his back with a piece of harness. You can imagine how amazed the innkeeper and his wife were and how quickly she took the baby and warmed and fed him. The man roused the neighbors, who followed Santo, now restlessly waiting for them. With such things as they could carry to help those they knew they should find in dire need, they waded through the snow two miles to a gully road, where they came upon an overturned bus from which the frightened horses had run away. There they found, huddled together for warmth, seven people, including the baby's father and mother. You can imagine how happy they were to know that the baby was safe. The innkeeper and the neighbors succeeded in getting all the travelers back to the inn, and so Santo really saved all those lives.

Now how did Santo know, in the first place, that there was trouble somewhere? Shut your eyes and think, before you read the next line, and learn that what made him prick up his ears and insist on getting out was the sound of the pounding of the runaway horses' hoofs, which his keen hearing caught, above the roar of the storm. He had before associated that sound with trouble, and his instinct made him go to the rescue.—Our Dumb Animals.

A Sleepy Time.

"O dear!" the little tin soldier cried,
"I've marched this whole day long,
Though my gun is heavy and hard to hold
And my legs are far from strong.

"And now I should like to take some rest;
It certainly can't be right
To expect a veteran like myself
To stand on guard all night."

The little toy horse, in great distress,
Called: "Who will attend to me?
I want to be put in my nice, neat stall
And be given some oats for tea.

"I've been to the market town and back
Today at my fastest trot;
And now I am lying upside down
With my harness tied in a knot."

Cried jack-in-a-box: "I've jumped and bounced
Till I'm quite worn out tonight;
Will somebody please shut up my house
And fasten the roof down tight?"

"I'm hoarse as a crow," said the barking dog;
"I'm tired," sighed the woolly sheep;
"We are all of us that," cried jumping jack,
"And we need some rest and sleep.

"We should like to go to our beds at once
And shut up our eyes quite tight.
Will our dear little master please to come
And settle us all for the night?"

But mother it was who put them up
In a row on the nursery shelf;
For never a word the master heard—
He was fast asleep himself.

—Eileen Manley, in Little Folks.

Working Tools of Insects.

I wonder if you know that the smallest insects you see about you have tools given them to do their work with. There is a little fly called a saw-fly, because it has a saw to work with. It has a really a very much nicer saw than you could make, if you were ever so old.

The fly uses it to make places where the eggs will be safe What is more strange, it has a sort of homemade glue which fastens them where they are laid.

Some insects have cutting instruments that work just as your scissors do. The poppy-bee is one of them, and its work is wonderful. This bee has a boring tool, too. Its nests are usually made in old wood. This borer cleans out the nest ready for use. When all is ready, the insect cuts out pieces of leaves to line the nest and to make the cells. These linings are cut in the shape of the cells. You would be surprised to see the care taken to have every piece of just the right size, so that it will fit. When they are fitted, the pieces are nicely fastened together and put into the nest.—"Watchman-Examiner."

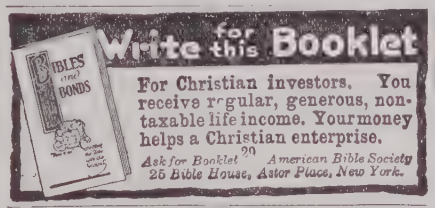
Wilson's Prayer.

Lord of Nations,
For this sick and wasted body
I do not pray;
Keep sacred my country's honor
Just for today
Make all her pledges inviolate
All through the fray;
May thy precepts guide her statesmen
For these I pray.



Lord, for this tired and thought-worn mind
Ne'er would I fret;

But the blasted hopes of a world
Would I regret.
Let not that peace dream sink in dust or fade away;
For it was born on Calvary's Tree
And not to-day.

Lord, for this still and withered hand
I do not care;
Nor for the acid cup of hate
That I must bear.
But for the bleeding hearts of men
Who grope to-day
For the peace and love that is not
For these I pray.

This poem was written by a Tennessee boy who prefaces his poems by some words of biography:

"I am a high-school boy and have been a reader of your splendid paper for a number of years. I glorified in the fight you made to uphold the principles of Wilson. I have just read—with a feeling of shame—Ambassador Harvey's speech, which he delivered in London. I believe that he cannot and does not represent America. I also believe that in years to come, when the sunshine of love, truth, and understanding has dissolved away the mists of doubt, jealousy, and party hatred, President Wilson will stand out as the first great international statesman. To my mind, America, in rejecting the League, faltered when she might have led the world."—Exchange.

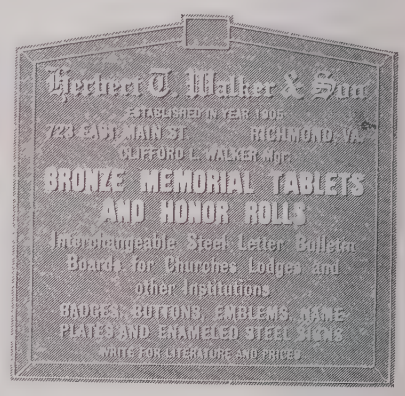
Seabrease: Entered into rest, July 30, at Waynesboro, Va., the REV. ALEXANDER W. SEABREASE, in the eightieth year of his age. Interment at Fort Wayne, Ind.

For all the saints, who from their labors rest,
Who Thee by faith before the world confessed.
Thy name, O Jesus, be forever blest,
Alleluia!

MRS. VIRGINIA PEYTON KENT.

When the death angel transported the noble and generous spirit of MRS. KENT from its temporary to its eternal home at the midnight hour of Thursday, August 25, there passed from our midst one whose unselfish, pure and upright life has silently built for itself a shrine in the hearts of all the many friends who have been inspired to higher thought and nobler purpose by the influence of that exemplary life.

Mrs. Kent was the daughter of the late Hon. John Howe Peyton, of Augusta County, and his wife, Anne M. Lewis. She came to Wytheville as the bride of the late Colonel Joseph Ferdinand Kent, and her long life in this town has but endeared her to a constantly widening circle of friends. In her girlhood she enjoyed every advantage that wealth could bestow, was educated in the best schools of the South, and came to her new home perfectly equipped to preside as mistress of a home known far and near for its gracious and lavish hospitality. Her influence as a mother was always potent and her children rise up and call her blessed.



The high veneration and esteem in which she was held was touchingly attested during the last days of her life, when news of her condition was sought anxiously by young, middle-aged and old of every station in life.

Mrs. Kent had not been strong for several years, but her wonderful vitality was shown in her never-failing interest in the activities of her children and grandchildren, and the world at large. Her love of the great outdoors was evidenced by her pleasure in the almost daily drives into the surrounding country. She had the comfort and joy of having her three children and two grandchildren with her for the past several weeks, and received their unremitting devotion and tender ministrations during her growing weakness, as the end gradually approached. The merciful Father spared her suffering and she calmly and peacefully "fell asleep." Her mind was clear and beautiful to the last, always thinking of others.

Mrs. Virginia Peyton Kent was born at "Montgomery Hall," the home of her father in Staunton, in March, 1841. She married Colonel Joseph F. Kent September 11, 1869, and became the mother of three children, all of whom survive—Joseph F. Kent, of Huntington, W. Va.; Mrs. Fontaine Broun, of Charleston, W. Va., and Miss Mary Preston Kent, who for years has devoted herself to the care and comfort of the beloved mother.

Saturday afternoon, as the sun was sinking to rest in the western sky, and amid masses of beautiful autumn flowers bearing testimony of the sympathy of many sorrowing friends, her body was laid to wait in God's acre till the resurrection morn.

And so our good-night kiss was given,
And like a lily her life did close;
Angels uncurtained that repose,
And the awakening was in heaven.

The Rev. Albert S. Thomas, for the past thirteen years rector of St. David's Church, Cheraw, S. C., has accepted the call to St. Michael's Church, Charleston, effective October 1. St. Michael's is one of the oldest and most distinguished parishes in the South, being one of the landmarks of the city. The church has been vacant since the death of Dr. John Kershaw last spring. Mr. Thomas is Secretary of the Diocese of South Carolina, historiographer, delegate to the last General Convention, and member of many important committees in the Diocese.

Chaplain Ernest W. Wood, U. S. Army, has been transferred from Camp Grant, Ill., to Fort Rosecrans, San Diego, Cal.

The Rev. Joseph A. Ryerson has resigned the rectorship of Grace Church, Riverhead, L. I., and accepted a call to Findlay, O.

The Rev. Israel H. Noe, rector of the Church of the Incarnation, Atlanta, has accepted the call to become dean of St. Mary's Cathedral, Memphis, Tenn., and assumed his new charge September 1.

The Rev. Edmund J. Gates has resigned his work at Camden, N. Y., and accepted the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Oxford, N. Y.

The Rev. T. D. Harari, rector of Christ Church, Lucketts, Va., was recently presented with a purse of $125 from the parishes at Hamilton, Purcellville and Round Hill, Va. These three parishes have been for some months without a rector, and Mr. Harari has been serving them during that period.

The Rev. Benjamin C. De Camp, formerly assistant at St. Paul's Church, Flatbush, Long Island, N. Y., who was recently called to the rectorship of the Church of the Ascension, Bloomfield, N. J., to succeed the late Rev. Hugh D. Wilson, entered upon his new duties September 1.

The Rev. J. J. Dixon, formerly of Alliance, Neb., is priest in charge of St. Andrew's Church, Basin, and St. Luke's Church, Greybull, Wyo. He is also the rural dean of the Big Horn.

Ordinations.

In St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, Mich., on July 2, the Bishop of the Diocese ordained to the diaconate Louis H. Berry, the presenter being the Rev. C. S. Sedgewick, minister of St. Cyprian's Mission, Detroit, and the preacher the Rev. R. W. Bagnall, former rector of St. Matthew's Church, Detroit. Mr. Berry is a graduate of Howard University and the General Theological Seminary. He will take up work among colored people in Flint and Detroit.

Deaths.

The Rev. T. Middleton, Archdeacon of Colored Work in the Diocese of Mississippi, and for years in direct charge of St. Mary's Mission and Industrial School, at Vicksburg, died on August 4.

The Rev. A. E. Elliott, late rector of Christ Church, Coxsackie, in the Diocese of Albany ,died at his residence in Ottawa, Can., on July 25. Mr. Elliott was a Canadian by birth, and of the twenty-eight years of his ministry, twenty-two were spent in the American Church. His body was taken to Shawville for interment in the cemetery adjoining St. Paul's Church.

Words.

Harriet Wilds Brown.

"I kept silence, yea, even from good words, but it was pain and grief to me."

Words are the commonest things in our lives. They are used as naturally by most of us as the air which we breathe. Yet in themselves they possess a world of power. It is one of the commonplaces of religious training to stress the harm which comes from unkind and ungenerous words. Perhaps no one can be found who would justify their use. But how about the failure to use good words, to give forth words of sympathy and appreciation? Can there be sins of omission in the use of good words just as there are sins of omission in the performance of good deeds?

There are people, many of them, of high character, whose lives are filled with deeds of kindness, but who fail utterly to give to the hungry the words of sympathy they crave. Some make it a matter of principle not to express gratitude or appreciation except in the most meager way. These same people are often receiving such words and would miss them sadly if they were withheld: and though they would not think of constantly receiving kind deeds and making no return, they see no reason for responding in the matter of words.

Now to many, perhaps to the best and greatest, generous and loving words are not necessary. But the average man or woman needs words as well as deeds. There are some who esteem the message on the card which accompanies a gift at Christmas time above the gift itself. They miss the kindly word withheld because, forsooth, their friend holds with the proverb that "actions speak louder than words."

The psalmist in the words quoted above is giving us, by implication at least, the lesson that a good man should verily suffer when he fails to give expression to the kind thoughts that are in his mind. Those who refrain miss the grace of the Master's words, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," though they would be very particular to give the service the material reward. Let us Christians not be guilty of the sins of omission in the matter of good words—words of sympathy and gratitude and appreciation and, most of all, of love.

I know not what the future hath of marvel or surprise,
Assured above that life and death His mercy underlies.
And if my heart and flesh are weak to bear the untried pain,
The broken reed He will not break, but strengthen and sustain.
And so, besides the sea I wait the muffled oar,
No harm from Him can come to me on ocean or on shore.
I know not where His islands lift their fronded palms in air,
I only know, I cannot drift beyond His love and care.

—Whittier.

The life of Christ is as precious as His Word; His purity is its power; His character its crown; His death its glory.—E. W. Caswell.

PARISH SOCIAL SERVICE

Do you want to get social service into your parish?

Why not plan for a Discussion Group this coming winter?

A Discussion Group in Social Service is a circle of men and women, or men or women, gathered round a table to discuss under a leader a live problem of their community.

There are such problems in your community. Do you know about them?

Men's Clubs.—Why not organize a Discussion Group for seven evenings in Lent? Begin to plan now.

Brotherhood Men and Girl's Friendly Girls.—Why not in arranging your program for next year's work plan a Discussion Group?

The Boys and Girls of Grand Rapids got the mayor and chief of police to come and tell them about their community: Why not have a Discussion Group, High School boys and girls?

Men and Women of the Church.—Why not give an evening a week in Lent to some thought about your duties as Christians to your community?

Clergy.—We do not ask any new work or another organization. All we ask is that you choose a key-man fitted to lead a Discussion Group. Choose him early in the fall and send his name to the chairman or secretary of your diocesan Social Service Commission and to the Department of Christian Social Service, at 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City. They will give him material and train him to lead the group.

Then get your vestry and your leading men and women to promise to get up a Discussion Group for one evening each week for seven weeks (or less if that seems too much). Why not arrange several Discussion Groups, the Men's Club, or Vestry, or Service League, or Young People's Club?

Communion

To stretch my hand and touch Him
Though He seem far away;
To raise my eyes and see Him
Through darkness as through day;
To lift my voice and call Him—
This is to pray!

To feel a Hand extended
By One who standeth near;
To view the love that shineth
In Eyes serene and clear;
To know that He is calling—
This is to hear!

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

This world only begins friendships.—Phillips Brooks.

Never would'st Thou have made anything if Thou hadst not loved it.—Wisdom 11:24.

"Two little things, a Match and a Mouse, Kindled the Fire that burned the house."

It is a tremendous moment when first one is called upon to join the great army of those who suffer.—Canon Scott-Holland.

God is behind all.
We find great things are made of little things
And little things go lessening, till at last Comes God behind them.
—Browning.

The world has a right to look worshippers, as they come out of church, in the face and ask them, "What do you bring away from your altar—your psalm, your sermon, your benediction? What gifts have you to distribute to your neighbors?"—Bishop Huntington.

We are contagiously religious. We will have a shrine and a god, partly because we see others have them. What religiousness are others catching from us?

Prayer never changes God's purpose, but it does change His action. It does not need to change His purpose, because His love is such that every right thing that you and I ever thought of praying for He had first planned to give. But (underscore the but) prayer does change God's action, because one can't give into a shut hand, and God never forces anybody.—S. D. Gordon.

Head of the School.

As the heart panteth for the water-brooks,
And seeks the shades whence cooling fountains burst;
Even so for Thee, O Lord, my spirit fainteth,
Thyself alone hath power to quench its thirst.

Take, O Lord, and receive all my liberty, my memory, my intellect, and the whole of my will, whatever I have and possess. Thou hast given them all; to Thee, O Lord, I restore them; all things are Thine; dispose of them as Thou willest. Give me Thy love, and Thy grace, for this is enough for me.—St. Ignatius.

When we know and feel Love, we know and experience God Himself. No words can name Him, no thought can grasp Him, no world can reveal Him. Only when we grasp the idea that God is Love do we get at the heart of it.

The ultimate truth in man is not in his intellect or in his possessions; it is in his illumination of mind, in his radiation of sympathy, in his recognition of this world not merely as a store-house of power, but as a habitation of man's spirit, with its eternal music of beauty and inner light of the Divine Presence.—Tagore.

We are what we are in God's sight, not what men think us, not what we think ourselves, but what He sees and knows that we are, nothing more, nothing less.—Dean Church.

One thoroughly unsympathetic hearer makes it profoundly difficult for those around him to enter heartily into the service, while an incandescent soul will create a little centre of warmth and vitality which will pass like a stimulating breath into other hearts around him.—Record of Christian Work.

THE SEMINARIES AND THE PEOPLE

When the National Conference of Social Work met in Milwaukee this summer, among the exhibits of various kinds installed in the galleries of the auditorium where the great assemblage gathered was one from the University of Wisconsin. In the centre were miniature buildings representing the university, and radiating from these were a multitude of ribbons leading to other miniature buildings and pictures representing the manifold interests of the State with which the university is in contact—the farm, the dairy, the school, the village library, the machine shop, and a whole range of other diverse activities to which the university is furnishing counsel and co-operation. It was a graphic evidence of what is being done increasingly now by the more progressive State universities of America. Their work is no longer bounded by their campuses. They feel a responsibility for a constituency far vaster than the group of students enrolled as such. They are reaching out to serve the whole people. They are seeking to become the intellectual laboratories to which can be brought the questions which have to do with any and every phase of human betterment, and in which can be worked out the answers applicable to the work-a-day realities of thousands who will never come within the university gates.

In this "extension service" of the universities, is there not an idea which the seminaries of the Church might well imitate? It may be that some of our own seminaries are attempting a service analagous to this (and if such be the case, we should like to publish an account of it), but we know of some seminaries at least which are doing nothing of the kind, and we rather suspect that they are not peculiar. The seminaries teach the men who come to them and enroll as students; but what are they doing to inform, to stimulate and to encourage by direct co-operation the men who are already in the ministry, and the laymen and laywomen in the parishes? The school-books used to tell us that a "rhetorical question" is one that is asked without expectation of an answer, and we do not know that we expect an answer to this one. At any rate, we do not know what the answer is.

On the contrary, it would seem that the seminaries—with due recognition of their great excellencies in the teaching of their enrolled students—are often separated by a great gulf from the thought processes, and the everyday problems of Christian work, of the churches even in their contiguous territory. They are spreading a thrilling feast of scholarship for the few, but how many in the Church at large get more than belated crumbs from that table? We say "belated crumbs" because, though the seminaries sometimes say that they influence the Church through the young men who are going out into the ministry constantly from their halls, and this seems true, yet there is another aspect in which this is so far from being an adequate statement of the fact as hardly to be true at all. For the young men, just because they are young and inexperienced, are often not listened to. Some of the elders, both among the clergy and among those lay popes who bend their awful brows upon any of the young man's deviations, listen to them with large approval as long as they speak with propriety, but if they say anything "peculiar," then the watchful elders will do their best to make plain to these young persons that "children should be seen and not heard." The result is that the young men going out to carry to the Church the message they have received at the seminary, often cannot "get the message across," unless the seminary backs them up very much more evidently than it usually does. The majority of the people are under the influence of leaders who represent the intellectual point of approach, and the conception of the Church's responsibility, which was characteristic of the seminaries a generation ago, but is not in the least characteristic of the seminaries now; and so a chasm of about twenty-five or thirty years continually yawns between the mind of the seminaries, which are supposed to teach the Church, and what the Church has actually got in its own mind. One may see dioceses under the very shadow of great seminaries in which practically all the Sunday schools and the adult Bible classes also are taught by men and women who lack the remotest notion of that historical and comparative method of study, so familiar in the seminaries, by which the real message and relative values of the different books of the Bible are alone revealed; and similarly there are churches by the score which are just as oblivious of the social gospel of the Kingdom of God, and of their responsibility in the light of it, as though neither the seminaries nor anybody else had ever taught or heard of such a thing.

This seems to us to be the situation; and if our estimate is correct, then the seminaries ought to face the needs of the Church, and their own stewardship, with the same wide vision of responsibility for service to the whole Church which the greatest universities are manifesting toward the whole State.

How the ideal of the most effective "extension service" on the part of the seminaries can best be worked out is for those within the seminaries, who intimately know their resources and their limitations, and not for those without, to say. But it is possible to offer suggestions which might become material for consideration.

1. In the first place, cannot the seminaries give wider value to those series of special lectures which they enjoy from time to time? Most of the seminaries have certain endowments upon which they invite once or twice a year eminent leaders in the thought or work of the Church to address the seminary body. Often these lectures take place without any one outside the borders of the seminary being in the least aware—unless by chance—that they are being given. If a seminary should send an announcement of such lectures and an invitation to the clergymen within a reasonably accessible distance, it is altogether possible that an increasing number of men would want to take advantage of them, particularly if in conjunction with these there should be arranged for two or three days a forum or seminar, in which there could be open discussion of questions raised by the lectures, or cognate problems of religion which men were anxious to bring into the seminary atmosphere for consideration.

2. A service, the intellectual leavening of which might be actually as powerful as it would be seemingly inconspicuous, might be rendered by a seminary if it would send out to a number of ministers and other Church leaders at regular intervals a list, compiled by the professors, of the recent books which they believed to be most stimulating, with a brief paragraph giving an idea of the nature and message of each book. The persons to whom such a list should be mailed at first could be chosen conservatively from among those of its own alumni whom the seminary faculty had reason to believe would be interested; it could grow by a natural process to include all those who should hear of the project and want to be included.

3. Might not the seminaries link themselves much more closely than they now do with the Diocesan Boards of Social Service and Religious Education? As we have already said, there is a serious gap between what the seminaries are teaching and what the children, and the adults, too, in many of the parishes are being taught. It would be a great benefit both to the seminaries and to the Church if the summer Schools for Sunday School Workers, and other training conferences for parish leaders which are becoming as familiar as they are valuable, should be held not at other places, but at the seminaries, and if the seminary faculties should reach out more and more to claim their tremendous privilege of bringing into the seminary atmosphere, and into touch with the quickening seminary scholarship, not only their limited company of ministerial students, but great bodies of men and women from the rank and file of the Church.

Developments such as these would cost money, which in part the seminaries would have to meet. But the seminaries will not have any trouble in raising money for a great "extension service" if they themselves become convinced, and therefore eloquent, concerning the immeasurable value which such a service can render to the Church.

OUR OBLIGATION TO THE FEDERAL COUNCIL

Has not the time come when this Church of ours ought to revise its relationship to the Federal Council of the Churches?

As the matter stands at present, that relationship is neither generous nor just. We receive benefits, and give next to nothing.

The Federal Council is the co-operative body through which many of the most virile ecclesiastical forces in this country carry on the sort of work which Christendom can best do in common. Everybody who considers facts knows that, in our present state of division, no single Christian communion is inclusive enough or powerful enough to bring the ideals of Christ prevailingly to bear upon conditions which affect whole communities and the whole nation. We might hold the most exalted conception imaginable of the divine origin and pre-eminent dignities of our Church (and somebody else might hold the same of his); but when the most exclusive "High Churchman" of our own or any other communion is up against realities, does he conclude that the Episcopal Church has a divine prerogative and a solitary divine sufficiency to take care of the Russian famine, or that the voice of the Presbyterians is all that is needed to settle the matter of international disarmament? We know very well that there are some problems and some needs so vast that the strength of all Christendom is indispensable if the ideals of Christ are to be translated into reality; and it is in order to make the voice of all the free Christian Churches articulate and their power effective that the Federal Council exists. Those communions which have joined it do not sacrifice their ecclesiastical independence, but they glorify their mission in so far as by association they make their ideals count in action.

The Federal Council has carried on, and is carrying on, most valuable research work in social service, in the problem of the rural community and the rural church, and in inter-racial relations—to name only a few of the most fertile subjects of its study. It has informed and organized the Christian mind and will in churches of every name concerning such works of mercy as the Chinese Famine Relief and the rebuilding of devastated churches in Belgium and France. It carried through only a little while ago the tremendous co-operative program of churches and synagogues to bring to tens of thousands of congregations simultaneously on an appointed Sunday an appeal for sentiment in favor of an international disarmament conference—an appeal which resulted in the awakening of a public sentiment which unquestionably has been felt in Congress and in the White House.

By all these activities of the Federal Council our Church has been benefitted. We are sharers in a body of Christian knowledge, and we are heirs of a potentially better Christian society, because of what the Council has done and is doing. But meanwhile we give to the Council what looks like a grudging and churlish recognition. We have not become a member of it. We "co-operate" through our Department of Christian Social Service and one or two other agencies, through which in effect we give a cautious, tentative part of ourselves and take whatever is best that we think the Council can give. And as a Church we do not appropriate one cent toward keeping the Federal Council in existence!

This is discreditable to the Church. It makes us look mean, and we ought to be ashamed of it.

We are going to urge that the next General Convention take this matter up and face it squarely. If we share the lift of the Federal Council, then as a Church we ought to share the load. A just proportion of the Federal Council's budget ought to be a regular charge upon the treasury of the Presiding Bishop and Council.

Meanwhile, with the Church as a whole doing nothing, individual congregations and individual persons can come forward in the Church's name. The Federal Council, with its budget already cut from $300,000 to $230,000, is in need of funds, and an appeal has gone out from the Executive Committee of its Board of Finance, of which Mr. John M. Glenn, a distinguished member of our Church, is chairman. We heartily commend to all our readers the Federal Council's appeal for contributions, large or small; and in order that no one who has the impulse to give may be prevented from giving now, we make the climax of this editorial the address to which cheques or other gifts may be made out and sent, namely, the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ, 612 United Charities Building, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York.

IS YOUR PARISH HELPING OUR 25,000 CHURCH STUDENTS?

THIS IS THE TIME TO SEND THEIR NAMES TO OUR CLERGY IN COLLEGE COMMUNITIES

WHY DOES NOT YOUR PARISH DO THIS?

THIS PARISH HAS COLLEGE CLUB

A new method of caring for college students has been developed by St. Mary's Church, Manhattanville, New York City, which, it is earnestly hoped, will spread rapidly to other parishes. Like most parishes, St. Mary's has a number of young people away at school or college and has not heretofore made any special effort to care for them. But unlike the majority of parishes, St. Mary's is set in the midst of colleges. A few short blocks south lies Columbia University, a few north is the college of the City of New York, and further north yet is New York University. So the parish has a double task: caring for her students away from home and entertaining those who come from a distance to New York colleges.

One Sunday morning, after church service, the rector, Rev. C. B. Ackley, called a meeting of all those who had attended colleges, universities or normal schools. A tentative organization was formed and another meeting to formulate plans was set for Wednesday night.

The following general scheme of work was drawn up at the later meeting. A committee was appointed to go over the parish lists with the rector and discover all young people of high school or college age; list those away at school or college, and bring to the attention of those not at college and to their parents the great desirability of a college education. In this connection it was decided to ask Rev. Paul Micou, College Secretary of the Presiding Bishop and Council, to address the congregation on this subject this spring.

Early in September it was voted to hold a good-bye service for those going to college; to notify the rectors in the college towns with sufficient data to personalize their first contacts with the students; to send to the students the parish paper and occasional letters (especially from the rector); to ask some of the students to report on the Church work and religious life of their colleges at the time of the giving out of notices the first or second Sunday after Christmas; to see to it that every student is set to work in the Church in some congenial way when graduated, and if he or she goes to another community to follow them up there with a letter to some clergyman who will make use of them. Such a plan, if carried out, will "stop the leaks" so far as the young people of St. Mary's are concerned.

On June 26 a most interesting "baccalaureate service" was held. Six recent college graduates walked with the choir in cap and gown. All high school graduates and all going up from one grade to another in the public schools had front seats in the congregation. The rector, in his address, called on the college graduates especially to return their debt for religious education by teaching in the Sunday school or working in other ways in the Church.

As far as St. Mary's relation to the New York colleges is concerned, we need not report on it here, since it follows the general lines laid down for a parish in a college community in Mr. Micou's book, "The Church at Work in College and University" (Morehouse).

All success to St. Mary's plan! In every parish there are college and university folk who have never quite "geared in." This gives them an opportunity along their own lines. Such parish university clubs or committees would be intensely interested in the material which is sent out from Mr. Micou's office if they were placed on his mailing list.—From Exchange of Methods, June, 1921.

List of Clergy Ministering to College Students.

GIVING OR GETTING

A Suggestion Evolved from the Problem of the Church's Social Life in Reference to Stewardship

The Rev. Conrad Harrison Goodwin

In every congregation there are men and women who will give time, talent and productive service to make money for the Church. They usually work as the Church, or as some organization representing the Church, in lawn fete, entertainment, bazaar. Through them the Church appeals to its members and to the world generally to come and buy, as a means of giving to the Church and extending the kingdom. The people come, get value received, enjoy themselves, feel that they have done the Church great service by patronizing the entertainment, and compliment the Church on being so clever in making Church support and extension so easy and enjoyable to the world and to its members.

We ask: Were the people who patronized the entertainment or ice cream festival giving to the Church or getting from the Church? Did they get value received—their money's worth? If not, from the standpoint of fairness and of patronage, the Church has greatly blundered. If so, in what way have those, thus entertained, given to the Church?

In this way we seek to make plain that the present confusion in the Church's social methods of finance, between giving and getting, has done two serious things: commercialized its social life and corrupted the spirit of self-sacrifice in stewardship.

In its worst forms, the religious quality and spiritual outlook of a congregation may be—often has been—destroyed by these seemingly harmless and natural ways of social life and money-making for the Church. The raffle, grab bag, lottery, and what not is too often camouflaged gambling. But of these things, or the worldly play, or dance, in the name of the Church, we do not speak. Their reaction is too swiftly and surely the death of missionary spirit and unselfish service to need comment.

But, as serious and earnest Church people, we need to realize that, while the lack of democratic social life is usually a weakness in the Church, and while we need more opportunities and plan in mingling in Christian fellowship, we need to guard our Church social life from becoming commercialized as much as our home social life, where giving rather than getting (or charging) is its spirit and joy. When the gathering is honeycombed with the question mark, How much is the crowd worth? What will we realize?—then the social aspect is secondary, a means to an end, a bait.

When the budget is made up and the appeal is made to meet the acid test—to show liberality and self-sacrifice in weekly giving to extend the Kingdom of God, the giving in a parish where such methods obtain is meager, and advice is given to supplement with entertainments and so raise money in an easy, pleasant way. This means that it hurts to give outright without any return. This means that money is not laid on the Lord's table with the holy elements of His self-sacrifice—to pledge the spirit of our self-sacrifice in time, and earning ability, and intelligent stewardship. So the joy of giving—honest giving—is not realized; the spirit in which the Master gave Himself is not real in Church finance; and the world, which judges the Church more by the way she makes money than by the way she spends it, sees a pleasure-loving spirit in the Church which does not grip the religious instincts of the unchurched.

These are facts from experience. To make light of the issue is but an index to the thoughtless, frivolous spirit that cannot perceive the need, nor summon the power, to do great things for God in a day of wonderful opportunity.

Such is the problem. We believe we need to give more thought to Church fellowship—to give for its maintenance rather than get something out of it. In the parish budget should be an item for social gatherings. Further, as a second method, a sum necessary to defray expenses could be required of each who attends a Church gathering, but not to make money. In the third place, individuals, as a group giving their time, materials, talent, could advertise in their own name some entertainment in which those attending would get their money's worth and so make it possible for those who gave the entertainment to make money for the Church. This is by no means hair-splitting when we thus distinguish this method from the Church's doing business or giving pleasure for gain. My office force or farm tenant may make it possible for my business so to succeed that I can give liberally to the Church. Yet if I pay them for their work, I am giving to the Church—not they—though they make it possible. So those who patronize my entertainment make it possible for me to give. But they get value received. They are not allowed to think that, if they cut down their giving for Church support and extension, they are still supporting the Church by patronizing Church entertainments. If I spend a quarter in pleasure or food and get value received—whether or not entertained by a group of Church workers in order to earn their free will offerings, then this should neither take the place of nor be thought of as supplementing my Church offering. But if entertainments thrive and free will offerings are miserly and trifling in amount, it does show me that I have money for pleasure, but have not the symbol of self-sacrifice. So I begin to think straight; and, out of shame that the joy of pleasure and self-gain is choking the joy of real giving and uncalculating self-consecration, comes new vision instead of blurred perspective, keener hearing to ears dulled with the clamor of things. So we shall hear the Master's command to give; and love, daring to test the Master's spirit of giving, shall bring God's children home to the Father.

"INASMUCH AS YE DID IT NOT"

A SERMON

By the Rev. Henry Sloane Coffin, D. D.

Have you ever noticed in the three solemn parables of judgment, grouped together in the twenty-fifth chapter of St. Matthew's gospel, which end with the rigid exclusion of the unfit, that these are condemned not for any wrong which they have committed? In every instance they meant well. Those at the King's left hand would have served Him had they recognized Him. The one-talent servant took particular pains to keep his Lord's money safe. The short-sighted virgins wanted to honor the marriage and did their utmost at the last minute to make up for their improvidence. They failed, not because they had done something bad, but because they had not shown certain positive qualities. They were all of them religious—deferential to the King, in awe of their Lord, eager to welcome the Bridegroom. But Jesus apparently brushes aside their good intentions and their religious feelings, and makes no allowance for them in the summary verdicts: "Depart from Me, ye cursed"; "Cast ye out the unprofitable servant"; "And the door was shut." In His kindly and considerate judgment there is no room in the Kingdom of God for the unbrotherly, the unproductive, the short-sighted.

There is no room for the unbrotherly. Those at the King's left are charged with failing to serve the hungry, the stranger, the sick, the imprisoned. Here are poverty, immigration, disease, criminality—age-old human problems. When they confront you and me in connection with some individual we know, most of us have heart and conscience enough to do something. * * *

But such instances of need come rarely to us personally. At this moment you and I cannot mention by name any who are hungry or lonely or sick or caught in the meshes of wrong-doing. To be sure, there are plenty of them. * * * But the plight of these folk is only indirectly our affair; it is the concern of our country, our city, or of society.

Take the single question of poverty, for example. At the moment the horror of unemployment from which we have been spared for several years is again upon us. Some people are glad of it. One hears the comment that labor has been having its day, and it held up the community; now it is capital's day, and labor must humbly ask for a job, and be glad to get anything. Some groups in labor have been just as selfish as some groups classed as capitalist, but no more selfih. There are tidal movements of human affairs which affect demand and supply, and the most clever and powerful have little control of them, and for the moment we are in one of those reactionary periods which follow such unsettling chapters in history as wars. Men are not talking with enthusiasm of social betterment or concerning themselves with justice in industries; but there is an effort to get back to a condition of things which seemed prosperous to at least some elements in the community. But we do well to recall that we were hardly in a paradise before the war, and that periodic spells of unemployment, plunging thousands in want and demoralizing their characters, can never be acquiesced in as the will of the Father in heaven for His household on earth. If unemployment threatens numbers of our brethren with poverty, it is something for which we and our whole nation will be judged. This is no time for Christians to lose interest in attempts at industrial readjustment, and to give over trying to order factories and businesses on a more fraternal basis where both responsibilities and opportunities are more justly shared. Social upheaval is no remote possibility. Not Russian proletarians, but British miners, have been raising the red flag this past week. Whether their demands be right or wrong, wise or foolish, such widespread movements on the part of fairly well educated and thinking men do not occur without cause. Can't you hear in this industrial judgment a voice saying both to leaders and a whole people, "Inasmuch as ye did it not—"? Viscount Bryce, in the preface to his masterly volumes on Modern Democracies, just published, remarks: "Even when one thinks a view unsound or a scheme unworkable, one must regard all honest efforts to improve this unsatisfactory world with a sympathy which recognizes how many things need to be changed."

Britain's plight today ought to convince the leaders of industry in our land that our enterprises should be carefully set in order that no cause for similar bad feeling and calamatous civil strife be left uncorrected. Followers of Jesus cannot be easy with the spirit prevalent in our own mines, factories, railways and commerce. Here is no manifest goodwill to serve. You and I, and our land, will be judged, not only for the wrongs we have done, although such may be charged to our account, but for the more brotherly day we were not thoughtfully, passionately and devotedly hastening. * * *

There is no room for the unproductive. The servant in the parable had only a single talent, and so he had less incentive to invest it than the servant with five. Bankers run after the possessor of five talents, but there is no great eagerness for a small account. Dozens of doors open of themselves to the man with brilliant abilities, but the average, and especially the less-than-average, person has to shove hard to get any opening at all. This servant took pains not to lose a farthing. He could say, "Lo, thou hast thine own." But Jesus holds out no prospect for him but the outer darkness.

And many of us find ourselves sketched in this least gifted servant. We have one-fifth or one-half the faith or the enthusiasm or the skill or the tact or the magnetism or the courage of other servants of Christ. In situation after situation we cannot help thinking of some one who could handle it far better. "There is So-and-so with five times my wisdom; or So-and-so with fully twice my ability." As we grow older we pride ourselves on keeping what we have. If we maintain our influence, if we live up to our reputation, if we conserve our faith, if we hold our courage, we feel that we are doing not ill. By middle age we have acquired caution. We have seen so many people take risks and lose that we cannot help cherishing an admiration for this servant who pursued so safe a course, and we do not think poorly of any one who can hand back everything that was trusted to him. But let us not forget that Jesus never said that the kingdom of heaven was of the middle-aged and elderly. "Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven." "I was afraid," said this timid man, and the seer on Patmos begins a list with "the fearful" who along with murderers and idolaters and all liars have their part in the lack of fire. The cowardly who will not risk failures have no place among the follower of the crucified and obviously are misfits in any community of which the Lamb is the light. This servant goes to the outer darkness because he lacks venturesomeness. Without daring, no man can be productive.

You and I have faith in Christ; call it "little faith, one-talent faith"; Jesus did not hesitate to take a minimum confidence, "faith as a grain of mustard-seed," and urge a man to tackle a mountain. What mountain, what foothill, that blocks Christian advance are we believingly setting ourselves to remove?"

You and I have enthusiasm for the Kingdom of God. It may be a very smouldering fire; never mind, fire is fire, and a single match or one smouldering coal can start a conflagration. Whom are we kindling with the vision of things made over, of an earth renewed in a springtide of love?

You and I represent many contacts. It may be that personally we are neither influential nor magnetic. But we are in touch with this and that person, and it may be that ours is the only Christian touch. What are we making out of it?

You and I control varied amounts of wealth. There are many times five-talent possessors here and possessors of considerably less than one talent. A talent is worth about $30,000. What are we producing with our money measured in terms of human beings? What gains in health, knowledge, beauty, righteousness, faith, does our money show?

You and I have a number of abilities—and surely Jesus had some purpose in using talents and not shekels or some lesser coin in His parable. It was His way of implying that the least gifted is a millionaire, for He took the largest current unit of wealth and made the poorest servant possessor of that. It will not do to come with our powers intact, and say, "Lord, all that I had I still possess." No, the query is: "How productive hast thou made thy talent?" And why not? Surely the prospect of a static community in which people keep things as they are is a boresome prospect in earth and heaven. It was unerring insight in Jesus which foresaw no place in the commonwealth of a creative Father for the unproductive. "Cast ye out the unprofitable servant."

There is no room for the short-sighted. Friends of Christ must have reserves on which they can draw. There are delay—experience had brought that home to Jesus, and surely it has brought it home to every one of us. From our point of view the Bridegroom always tarries. How long we must wait to see some life in whom we are keenly interested wedded to Christ! How slow the process of getting a business house, a civic administration, a college community, even a church, truly married to Him—the group-mind and His with but a single thought, "two hearts that beat as one." Friends of the Bridegroom, however eager to see the wedding consummated, will never last out without reserve supplies of patience, hope and trust. * * *

Many well-intentioned people treat their spiritual natures as an improvident farmer the soil of his acres. They keep constantly drawing upon themselves for endurance, for cheerfulness, for goodwill, for self-control, for conscientiousness, for zeal, without bothering their heads to renew their spirits. Many adults are draining natures well cultivated by devout parents and teachers in childhood, and neglecting to provide any similar cultivation for themselves today. Some fathers and mothers are using up the ideals grown in their own consciences well-fertilized by an earlier generation, and failing to stock their children's natures with the same fertilizer. There are a good many harvests reaped by our generation from soils that were enriched by believers of a former day. One can think of families and churches and whole communities that are expending their spiritual capital. But the judgment overtakes the short-sighted farmer in diminishing crops and in the final poverty of his acres; and a like judgment is as certain for the spiritually improvident.

The ideal community is not composed of thoughtless persons who are forever importuning their neighbors to help them out with a loan. In matters of character one cannot borrow. The most kindly disposed friend cannot lend us sensitiveness of conscience, or self-control. When the emergency comes, a man either possesses or lacks his own supplies. Without them he is excluded from the fellowship in which they are essentials. So rigorously exacting is life; and Jesus knew it, and spoke with the most loving frankness to all who, like these well-meaning but thoughtless girls, make no provision for strains on character. In providing reserves of the spirit, short-sightedness is not forgivable. The door is shut. Men and women, what pains are we taking to store our natures and to renew ourselves in faith and hope and love? * * *

No room for the unbrotherly, the unproductive, the short-sighted! They are undesirables here or anywhere else. And if these searching and unanswerably reasonable parables of Jesus seem to classify you and me among the unfit, the same Jesus invites us to follow Him and live with Him, and under His control become brotherly, useful and stored with the fulness of God. That is the gospel. This is Jesus Christ—what shall we say to Him?

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

ON DIVORCE LEGISLATION.

Mr. Editor: Allow me to call the attention of your readers, especially the members of women's clubs and societies, to a strong appeal to women on the divorce question, which appears in the September issue of Good Housekeeping. It is entitled "A Call to a New Crusade." The author is judge of the Probate Court of Boston, where he has had a large experience in alimony, which is declared by Judge Morschauser, of the Supreme Court of New York, to be one of the chief roots of the evil. The plea of Judge Grant is for uniform Federal legislation, which necessarily implies an amendment to the Constitution.

Hitherto the chief objection to uniform laws, such as we have in business contracts and many other national affairs, has been, as the author says, "deep-seated, individual State self-complacency." Lawyers also have found or imagined impossible difficulties. But the Edmonds bill for an amendment to the Constitution meets in an admirably simple way the worst of these, namely, for fear of such States as South Carolina and New York that their standard should be lowered; South Carolina granting only judicial separation without right of remarriage, and New York confining that right to adultery as the ground of the action. The judge seems to be unaware of the Edmonds bill; but the proposed amendment has this as a proviso, namely, that while Congress shall have power to establish a maximum of causes for absolute divorce, every State may reduce (but not increase) that maximum, as in the case of South Carolina to no cause whatever, and of New York to only one.

The way for this bill has been already blazed by the work of various State commsisions on uniformity. It only remains now to bring the power of public opinion to bear on Congress to apply this remedy to the most imminent danger that threatens today the very life of the nation. It is to urge sane Americans, especially members of women's clubs, to stir up interest and take definite measures to this end, that Judge Grant has written his paper. He begins by calling attention to the fact that the average rate of divorces to marriages in the United States in 1916 was one to nine. But this is really an under-statement of the case, for that year Nevada had one divorce to 1.54 marriages; Oregon one to 254; Washington one to 4.01, etc., while New Hampshire leads the East with one to 6.40.

The first week in October the Association for the Sanctity of Marriage will issue its next bulletin on "The Cruelty of Divorce Legislation," which is now in type. It hopes also to print the admirably practical article by Bishop Moreland on "Five Divorce Remedies," which lately appeared in the New York Times, but funds are greatly needed for this purpose. Checks should be made payable to the Rev. Dr. Edwin A. White, Treasurer, and sent to me.

DR. HUTCHINS AND THE HYMNAL.

Mr. Editor: I was mightily surprised to read in Bishop Faber's letter to the Church papers that the New Hymnal was not selling satisfactorily. It has been advertised exceedingly well. We have almost been threatened if we used any other hymnal. So it is odd that all have not fallen in line and furnished every pew with that book. But is it odd?

The Rev. Charles Hutchins had many friends in the Church. He did much for the music of the Church. And he did it with his own money, and without much hope of receiving any adequate return. Those of us who knew him personally could not do other than stand by him in his last days. He was a loyal friend and it behooved us to be loyal to him. When the writer went to North Dakota to work, Dr. Hutchins sent out a box of excellent books to keep the spirit right in his far-off friend. He was thoughtful and kind, always doing some such thing for those he knew well enough to do such things for. In his last days he saw that some appreciated his work and thought enough of him to stick to his publications. He went to his grave with some kind and sympathetic words before his eyes. Many of us would gladly have given the royalty on a thousand hymnals to the Church Pension Fund rather than had the last days of Dr. Hutchins made so depressing. Is it any wonder that the New Hymnal is not going immediately into every pew of the American Church?

AN APPEAL TO DIOCESAN SECRETARIES.

Mr. Editor: The attention of the secretaries "of every Diocese, Missionary District and the Convocation of American Churches in Europe" is respectfully called to Canon 50, §IV (ii), requiring their transmission "on or before September 1 in each and every year," to the Recorder of General Convention of the names of the clergy and deaconesses as stated in said canon.

On February 10 I was appointed by the Rt. Rev. D. S. Tuttle, D. D., LL. D., D. C. L., Presiding Bishop of the Church, to that office, made vacant by the death of the Rev. Herman C. Duncan, S. T. D. (who had been Recorder since 1885), and only the journals of the Canal Zone, Louisiana, New Jersey and Springfield have been received.

The importance of keeping these records as required by the Church needs no emphasis, and the attention of all secretaries to this canon of the General Convention is earnestly requested.

The Great Commission.

AN ENGLISH BISHOP PRAISES ST. JOHN'S, SHANGHAI.

The Rt. Rev. W. Banister, English Bishop in Kwangsi and Hunan, writes enthusiastically of what he calls "the high altruistic services rendered by American Christian educators in China":

"Their contribution to the moral uplift of the Chinese by means of higher education stands pre-eminent above all the efforts of other Christian enterprises in the East, and is due in part to the fact that America devoted a portion of the Boxer indemnity to furthering education among the Chinese. In this task the highest position has been taken by an institution of our own Anglican Communion.—St. Johns' University, Shanghai."

Bishop Banister says that St. John's is worthily exemplifying its motto, "Light and Truth." Most of its graduates, since the incorporation on a university basis, Bishop Banister says, are "filling important positions of trust and influence in the political, commercial and intellectual life.

"Some are helping to direct the political destinies of their country in relation to world problems and adjustments, for example, Dr. Wellington Koo and Dr. Alfred Sze, the Chinese Ministers to London and Washington, and Dr. W. W. Yen, the present Minister for Foreign Affairs at Peking. In all, some twenty-three men are serving the State in one capacity or another.

"Twenty men are serving the Church as religious leaders, and one is at the head of the Y. M. C. A. organization for the whole of China. Nearly a hundred men are taking part as teachers in the educational and intellectual movements among students.

"Twenty-four graduates in medicine, who have subsequently qualified in foreign universities side by side with young men of America and Great Britain, are making a great contribution to the well-being of the Chinese people. Some of these men hold positions of eminence and distinction as specialists.

"Then in engineering, some of the men from St. John's hold the first places in enterprises for the extension of communications and mining. In the great trunk lines which are extending year by year and linking the provinces and people together, and in the development of the vast mineral and coal deposits, which make China so important in the economic life of the world, they are to be found.

"Other men are engaged in large commercial corporations, business houses and banks in many parts of China. This is a great achievement and a worthy disposition for an institution to hold. There is not the glamor of ancient halls of learning about the great buildings erected at Jessfield, but they impress the observer as meeting the needs of the present time in China.

"The American Church can be warmly congratulated on its work at St. John's for present and future generations of Chinese students."

GOLDEN JUBILEE OF THE WOMAN'S AUXILIARY.

The Golden Jubilee of the Woman's Auxiliary is nearly here. On October 16, 1921, the Woman's Auxiliary will celebrate its fiftieth anniversary.

For the past year committees have been busy in each diocese and missionary district trying to make the women realize what the Auxiliary has stood for during these fifty years, and what it has accomplished. These same committees are collecting money which, it is hoped, will represent a gift from every member of the Auxiliary. This money will be presented on October 16 at a celebration of the Holy Communion in each parish church, when the women will be asked to dedicate themselves afresh to the service of the Master that He may use them in the spread of His kingdom.

The Auxiliary is hoping for $50,000, which will be given as a trust fund to the Presiding Bishop and Council, the interest to be used for missionaries at home on furlough, for medical care, for board, study or recreation. It will be known as the Emery Fund in grateful appreciation of what the three Emery sisters have meant in the life of the Auxiliary.

Different dioceses are pursuing different plans in connection with this fund, but it does not matter so much how the money is raised, if the idea of gratitude to God for the fifty years of service is kept to the front, and if the celebration culminates in a re-dedication of the women of the Church to the service of the Master, so that each one may be truly a reasonable, holy and living sacrifice to Him.

Already over $10,000 has been paid in, and many dioceses send word that they will exceed the amount set as their goal. The missionary districts in the foreign field are co-operating splendidly. When the final report is made it is hoped that every diocese and district in the Church will be represented. In the meantime the Auxiliary would have the Church continue to pray that this anniversary may be observed as Christ would have it observed, and that many women may be led to know the joy of service through His Church as they have never known it before.

A NOVEL OFFERING FOR THE ARCHDEACON STUCK MEMORIAL FUND.

Miss Eleanor J. Ridgway, who is serving at St. John's in the Wilderness, Allakaket, the most remote of our interior stations in Alaska, writes:

"On the Fourth of July, at the service, I had an offering taken for the Archdeacon Stuck Memorial Fund, and I enclose a draft for $41.50. The offering was a novel one in that $26.50 of it was cash and there were twenty-two muskrat skins. These I took to the trader and he helped towards the offering by giving us $2.25 more than the value of the skins. May I say to the credit of our native people that among the twenty-two skins given, there was put one poor one. On June 26, at the morning service, I asked them to be prepared on that day to give the offering. After the service the people said that some did not have the cash, and would it be all right to give the skins? They said that the Archdeacon had always been their friend and they honored him and wished to give to the fund."

This offering has been added to the fund for the endowment of St. Stephen's Hospital, Fort Yukon, in memory of the late Archdeacon Stuck. Of the $25,000 asked for this purpose, there has so far been received $2,652.24. With the exception of two or three gifts from friends in this country who have not waited for a formal announcement that gifts would be received, everything given so far has come from the Archdeacon's white and Indian friends in Alaska. The last $1,000 has been promised by a member of the Church in Virginia.

COMPARING THE EDUCATION OF BUDDHISTS AND CHRISTIANS.

Bishop Tucker, of Kyoto, points out that the Buddhists are giving their candidate priests a much more thorough scholastic training than we are giving to our theological candidates in Japan. In addition to the men who study in these Buddhist universities and theological schools they are sending a large number of their men through the Imperial universities. "I think," says Bishop Tucker, "that one might make the following comparison between the education given by the Buddhists and the Christians. Our men probably get better training in the English language, and probably equally good training in specifically Christian subjects such as the Bible, dogmatics and Church history as do the Buddhists in Buddhist theology. The Buddhists, however, seem to get a very much more thorough training in philosophy, psychology and in Oriental subjects."

A list of subjects taught in Buddhist institutions includes not only the study of the history, literature and philosophy of Japan and other Oriental nations, but such subjects as the history of English literature, the principles of sociology, the outline of ethics, the history of pedagogy, political economy, mental diseases, biology. Bishop Tucker believes that just as the Buddhists send some of their picked students to the Imperial universities, so the Church in Japan should be helped to send some of its picked men for study either to the Imperial University in Kyoto or Tokyo or abroad for two or more years. While this plan has been followed occasionally, Bishop Tucker would have it made a regular part of our educational work.

INDIANS TRAVEL SEVENTY-FIVE MILES FOR CHRISTIAN BURIAL.

Miss Eleanor J. Ridgway, of our St. John's-in-the-Wilderness Mission, Allakaket, Alaska, writing in July, says:

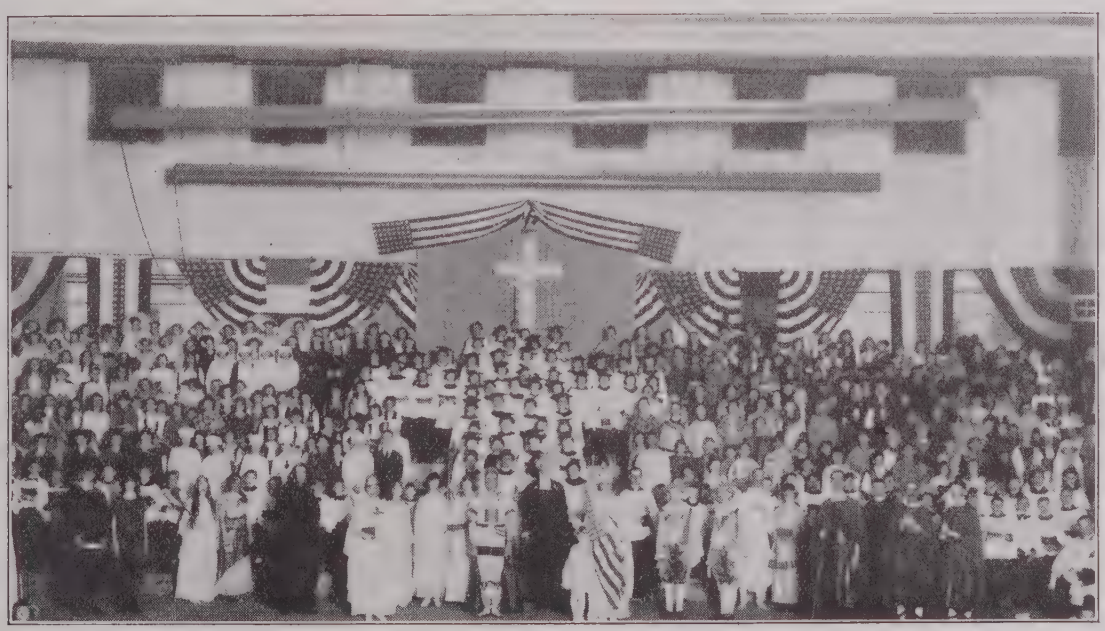
"Our chief's twelve-year-old daughter, Clara, died of tuberculosis at their spring hunting camp away up the Kanuti River. They brought her body back to the village after the "break-up," for the chief said that they could not bury her without the prayers of the mission. The body must have been brought at least seventy-five miles by boat. This is the third time in the five years I have been here that this has happened."

The General Committee of the English Church Missionary Society has adopted a budget of $3,000,000 for the year 1921-22. This amount is expended entirely in work outside the British Isles.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor.



PAGEANTRY.

Instruction and inspiration through pageantry has become very popular in recent years, and has been utilized by many churches.

The Presiding Bishop and Council, recognizing the opportunity afforded by the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of our missionary societies, has issued a pamphlet with the words for a pageant to present in dramatic form the mission of the Church.

We present below a picture that was taken last year of the stage in the City Auditorium, Richmond, Va., when a pageant was presented in connection with the second phase of the Nation-Wide Campaign.

We use this cut because it shows the arrangement of the vested choir in the form of a cross, and such a seating plan is practicable and effective in any building where there is space enough and in connection with any pageant.

PHOTOGRAPH OF VIRGINIA PAGEANT SHOWING CROSS FORMED BY VESTED CHOIRS.

In this particular case the choirs marched in and took their seats, thus forming the cross in view of the audience, but if this is not feasible the choir could come in and take their seats before the congregation assembles. In either case the presentation of the white cross formed by the choir makes an attractive feature of any pageant of this sort.

The pamphlet issued by the Presiding Bishop and Council contains a pageant that is adaptable for large or small congregations, and will certainly be helpful in presenting the work of the Church in an interesting manner.

A number of publications in connection with the Centennial are being issued at the Church headquarters, and it is well worth while to write to procure the list of them from Rev. F. J. Clarke, Secretary Committee on Arrangements, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

FIVE-YEAR-OLD WISDOM.

A curly-headed five-year-old nephew was spending a few hours with his aunt in one of our Southern cities en route from his home further South to join his mother in the mountains.

The aunt was reading aloud to entertain him, and incidentally keep him quiet, for the rest of the journey was a long and tiresome one.

The aunt stopped reading for a few minutes to arrange some detail of the parlor furniture.

"You better go on reading," said the small tyrant; "you won't have me to read to tomorrow."

His motive was purely selfish, but he unconsciously struck a chord that would be well for us to sound more often.

In this particular instance everything was being done for this child that could be done for his happiness, but is it always so?

Are there not many times when our treatment of children would be different if we felt that they would not "be here tomorrow," and they won't be with us always?

We do not mean this in a sinister way with reference to the little ones being snatched away from us by death, but too frequently we forget how soon childhood will be past, and only a period in the memory of the little one by our side.

Are we treating our children so that their childhood will be a period of happy memories on which some day they can look back with joy and from which they can draw food for pleasant reflection in years to come?

No one can foresee the eventualities of a lifetime. Enforced idle periods may come to any of us in which we shall be compelled to fall back upon our own resources, perhaps not even being able to read. In such a case no one can estimate the value of joyous happy childhood years which will be like a reservoir from which to draw pleasant thoughts that will make congenial companions if the latter are not procurable.

Church Intelligence

A Celebration of the Holy Communion for the Men and Boys of the Church.

Again the Brotherhood of St. Andrew is early suggesting to the clergy of the parishes and missions of the Church the opportunity presented at the beginning of the Church's year—the First Sunday in Advent, November 27, for the holding of a Corporate Communion for the confirmed men and boys of the Church.

For the last two years the suggestion has met with increasing favor, and many thousands of men and boys were reached for the service this day. Cards similar to those of last year will be prepared by the Brotherhood office, and designed to be distributed to the male communicants of the individual parishes and missions. Last year over sixty-six thousand of them were used.

Services for the Deaf.

On the morning of the Fifteenth Sunday after Trinity, September 4, upon the occasion of the thirty-fifth annual convention of the Pennsylvania Society for the Advancement of the Deaf, the Rev. Oliver J .Whildin, of Baltimore, preached the convention sermon. The service, which was arranged for the large number of delegates and visitors in attendance at the convention, consisted of the Holy Communion. Among those assisting the Rev. F. C. Smielau, missionary to the deaf in the Dioceses of Pittsburgh, Harrisburg, Bethlehem and Erie, in the service were the Rev. Henry J. Pulver, of Washington, D. C., and the Rev. H. C. Merrill, of Utica, N. Y.

New Warden for the DuBose Memorial School.

The Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Charleston, S. C., and director and founder of the Sewanee Conference for Church Workers, has been called to be warden of the DuBose Memorial Church Training School, Monteagle, Tenn., and has accepted. Dr. Logan will enter upon his new work at once, and the school will open September 21.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Death of the Rev. W. N. Meade.

The Rev. William Nelson Meade, rector of South Farnham Parish, Essex County, Va., died at Boyce, Clarke County, on Friday, September 2, and was laid to rest among the graves of his ancestors at the Old Chapel in Clarke. Mr. Meade was a grandson of Bishop Meade and son of Francis Burwell and Mary Mann Meade. He was educated at the University of Virginia and the Theological Seminary at Alexandria, and was ordained in 1885. He served churches at Hampton and Herndon and in Northampton County, Va., and Anderson, S. C., before removing to Tappahannock about seventeen years ago. His was the quiet, effective work of a country clergyman who won the love and esteem of his people and was content to remain and expend his strength among them. His health was never robust and had been failing for several years. He had just finished a few weeks' vacation among the scenes of his boyhood, but his return was delayed by the illness and death of a sister, Mrs. Whiting, which was quickly followed by his own decease.

Laying of Cornerstone of St. Mark's Church.

The cornerstone of the new St. Mark's Church, Richmond, the Rev. Dr. W. D. Smith, rector, was laid on Saturday afternoon, September 10, at 4 o'clock, the ceremonies being under the auspices of Metropolitan Lodge, No. 11, A. F. & A. M. The Hon. James Alston Cabell, a member of the lodge and prominent layman, was the principal speaker.

St. Mark's sold its former building at First and Clay Streets over a year ago, and the congregation has since been worshipping in the R. E. Lee public school building. The work on the new church will be pushed as rapidly as possible, and it is hoped that sufficient progress will be made to enable the congregation to hold its services in the new building before many months, although it will not be completed for some time to come.

Church School Locations Healthful.

At the request of the Rev. Edmund L. Woodward, M. D., dean of Church schools in the Diocese of Virginia, Dr. Ennion G. Williams, State Health Commissioner, recently visited the two schools that are now in process of establishment by the Diocese of Virginia in Tidewater Virginia. These schools are St. Margaret's, at Tappahannock, Essex County, a school for girls, and Christchurch School, for boys, near Urbanna, in Middlesex County.

The site of St. Margaret's is the home property of the late Judge Wright, adjoining the village, with about eight acres of land. The spacious lawns border on the Rappahannock River, giving a splendid view for miles of the river, which is several miles wide at this place. The old mansion, with its high pitched rooms, lends itself admirably as the nucleus of the new school building, to which will be added large wings on either side.

Christchurch School for Boys is on the old Eastman estate, adjoining the historic colonial Christ Church built in 1664, and the school property has about one hundred acres. The large mansion, surrounded by stately oaks, is located on an elevation probably the highest in the county, and commands a magnificent view of the Rappahannock River about a quarter of a mile distant. Level stretches of high ground furnish an unexcelled location for campus and athletic grounds, while sixty acres are under cultivation.

Dr. Williams expressed himself as being enthusiastic about the possibilities of both schools, and in a letter to Dr. Woodward, said: "Your board is certainly to be congratulated in securing two such admirably located sites, where utility, natural beauty and salubrious surroundings are combined to form of the foundations of your schools. The three big factors for good health in a tidewater country can easily be controlled. They are water supply, sewage disposal and musquito breeding. At St. Margaret's you have already the best of water from the deep artesian well, and at Christchurch the ample natural spring is well protected. The sewage can be disposed of in septic tanks. The absence of mosquitoes at present and the absence of any near mosquito breeding places offer a practical guarantee of freedom from malaria."

The Centennial of St. Stephen's Church, Culpeper: Piedmont Convocation.

While making extensive repairs to this old church in 1916, the cornerstone was found, and in it a copper plate giving the names of the officers of the local Masonic Lodge and the date, September 8, 1821. The Centennial birthday of St. Stephen's has just been held, shared in by the community, Fairfax Lodge, No. 43, of Masons, and the Piedmont Convocation, holding its autumnal meeting.

It began with a celebration of the Holy Communion on the Fifteenth Sunday after Trinity, and an historical sermon by the Bishop of the Diocese. In the evening the senior ex-rector, the Rev. J. G. Minnegerode, D. D., made an address largely reminiscent.

Monday night members of all the congregations in Culpeper accepted an invitation to worship together, and addresses were made by their ministers, under the Bishop's license, on the "Influence of a Parish in a Community for a Century in (1) Pulpit Message, (2) Sacramental Services, (3) and Pastoral Ministry in the Home."

A missionary service was held Tuesday night with another large congregation. In the regretted absence of the Rev. W. H. Ramsauer, through illness, three addresses were made on "Christian Education." The Rev. Dr. E. L. Woodward described it in the "Far East"; the Rev. T. D. Harrari in the "Near East," and the Bishop in this Diocese, especially in the work of the "Church schools" now in operation. He made an earnest appeal for assistance in this education of our youth.

Wednesday morning the Piedmont Convocation organized for business; adjourning for morning worship, and a sermon by the Rev. Percy F. Hall, of Alexandria. After lunch served in the parish hall, the convocation met, and the Rev. W. D. Smith, for the Diocesan Nation-Wide Campaign Committee for 1922, organized the convocation for the canvass for this autumn, with four centers of operations: Alexandria, Leesburg, The Plains and Culpeper. At night, after Evening Prayer, the Rev. Dr. Berryman Green preached on "A Parish Centennial.

Thursday morning many members of the congregation conveyed the members of the convocation to the old Colonial church of "Little Fork," a dozen miles in the country. Meeting the local congregation, the Holy Communion was celebrated by the dean of convocation, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Hall, Minnegerode, Everett and Mellichampe. The Rev. Mr. Mellichampe preached from the text, Acts 9:6. Afterwards the congregation adjourned to the hospitable home, "Rosedale," already known to many of the clergymen of this Diocese, where dinner was served abundantly on the lawn to a company of guests too large to enter the house. A business session of the convocation was held immediately afterward, when an invitation was accepted to the parish of Falls Church for the spring meeting.

In St. Stephen's Church at night Fairfax Lodge, No. 43, accepted an invitation to worship with the congregation, and the church was again filled to its capacity. This service of the Centennial program was diretly associated with the laying of the cornerstone, as an anniversary, and the Rev. J. J. Lanier, D. D., of Fredericksburg, preached on the building of spiritual character.

The absence of four former rectors, detained by engagements or illness, was greatly regretted, as well as that of members of the convocation unable to come. It was a sincere pleasure to have those who did come. The parish has been benefitted, and will remember long and happily their help in celebrating its Centennial with the one hundred and eighth semi-annual meeting of the Piedmont Convocation.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor.

Recruiting for the Ministry.

There has been a deep interest on the part of ministers and people of the Diocese in the recruiting of the clergy. The cause has been brought again and again before the people. We have reason to be encouraged by the result. The need is still great, but we may hope that the time is not distant when every church in the Diocese can be supplied. There are three students from Southern Virginia at the Virginia Seminary, with the prospect of another in the fall. There is one at the Philadelphia Divinity School, two at the Bishop Payne Divinity School, and three candidates are preparing in their parishes. The Diocese has seven postulants at the University of Virginia, three at William and Mary College, and one at Yale—two others are preparing elsewhere. Altogether there are seven candidates and nineteen postulants in the now divided Diocese of Southern Virginia.

Consecration of St. Mark's, Cochran.

On Sunday, September 4, St. Mark's Church, Cochran, the Rev. F. B. Tucker, minister in charge, was consecrated by the Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, Bishop of Southern Virginia. In addition to the above, the following assisted in the service: The Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, Bishop Coadjutor; the Rev. A. P. Gray and the Rev. A. P. Gray, Jr. After the consecration by Bishop Tucker, the Rev. F. B. Tucker and the Rev. A. P. Gray, Jr., read Morning Prayer, Bishop Tucker preached, and Bishop Thomson celebrated the communion. Dinner was served on the grounds, and in the afternoon Bishop Tucker confirmed a class of six. St. Mark's is a small brick church of very attractive design, situated in an oak grove at the juncture of two roads. It is in a farming community and supplies a very real need, being the only church in the neighborhood. The church was started by the Rev. A. P. Gray, Jr., when he was rector of the parish, and the success of the work and the building of the church are in large measure due to his energetic and faithful work.

Memorial to Mrs. Letcher.

The Loulie Taylor Letcher Memorial Committee wishes to announce that by vote of the parish branches it has been decided that the memorial to Mrs. Letcher is to be scholarships in St. Agnes' School, Japan.

The number of scholarships will, of course, be determined by the size of the fund contributed to support them. Mrs. Letcher was the founder of the Woman's Auxiliary in Southern Virginia, and gave the best years of her life to the work, being its only president so long as she lived. The women of the Diocese desire, by means of this memorial, not only to commemorate her life of consecrated service, by furthering a work so dear to her heart, but to extend and perpetuate among themselves the influence of that life, that the inspiration of it be not lost.

Epiphany Church, Danville.

A large congregation was present at the morning service Sunday, September 4, in the Church of the Epiphany, Danville, when Rev. Malcolm S. Taylor, the new rector, conducted his first service. Mr. Taylor was called from Grace Church, Berryville, and the Berryville people were as loath to give him up as Danville is glad to have him. Epiphany is exceedingly fortunate to have secured the services of such a man, and welcomes him and his family most heartily into the church and community.

The rectory has been put into thorough repair, and the pantry well stocked with winter provisions.

Mr. Julian Meade will be the teacher of the Men's Bible Class, which was organized the first Sunday in September. Much interest was manifested and the attendance good.

Under the guidance and leadership of Mr. Taylor as rector, and Dr. J. C. Hall as rector-emeritus, great things may be expected of Epiphany.

Improvements Made in Grace Church, Mt. Airy.

During the summer important improvements, costing thousands of dollars, have been made in Grace Church, Mt. Airy, the most notable being the installation of a new organ, to replace the old instrument. The chancel has been enriched by beautiful wood carvings, and the transept has been converted into a baptistry. An attractive looking pavement is now being laid. The rector, the Rev. Thomas S. Cline, who is spending his vacation in Conway, N. H., during September, will have the Rev. William G. Emhardt care for all parochial work and preach on Sundays.

Church Reopened for Worship.

Services were resumed on Sunday, September 11, at the Church of St. Luke and the Epiphany, Philadelphia, which was closed last month for repairs and improvements. There was Holy Communion, with sermon at 11 o'clock. The church was not open in the afternoon, but at 4 P. M. there was an open-air service in the orchard at the church farm at Broomall. The choir from the home church visited the farm to sing, and the rector, the Rev. David M. Steele, D. D., made the address. This was the last service to be held in the open air in the orchard at this novel church and recreation center.

Recent Bequests: Eighteen thousand dollars was bequeathed to St. Mark's Church, Philadelphia, and to several charitable institutions by the late Mrs. Bessie V. Watterhouse, who died August 16.

The endowment fund of St. Mark's Church is given $5,000. The income of an additional $4,000 is to be divided between St. Michael's and St. Mary's Missions. A $5,000 bequest is provided for the Society to Protect Children from Cruelty, and a $2,000 gift for the Francisville Home at Radnor, Pa. A like amount is given to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals for water stations for horses.

Mr. Morris Earle, one of the leading laymen of the Diocese, was appointed by Bishop Rhinelander as chairman of the special Ways and Means Committee to raise the $50,000 for the needy Church institutions in the Diocese. Notwithstanding vacation absences and general business conditions, Mr. Earle reports about $27,000 received. Among other things he says, "I am proud of the small subscriptions."

Much activity obtains in New York this autumn in preparation for the welfare of some of the 25,000 students who come to New York from many parts of the country. The Bishop of New York, rectors of Calvary, Transfiguration, vicars of Intercession and St. Paul's Chapels, the Rev. Paul Micou, Chaplain Knox, of Columbia, and others are leading in the plans, and the Church is ahead of all other bodies in these plans. A series of hostess houses, with Greer House as a starter, is proposed from other cities. Into Greer House have been introduced many comforts for the sixty young women which it accommodates. There is a Dutch kitchen, including admirable facilities for the making of fudge, etc. Only young women duly certified to by bishops and others are admitted, and the house is already filled.

Methodists come next in care for students. Years ago they saved one downtown church, while removing several others, and have kept it till now on old lines. Now a new property has been acquired and student work on the lines of Greer House will be attempted. Students from Columbia University are to make a canvass of the community, which is West Side and down town.

For Russian Sufferers: Archbishop Tikhon, Metropolitan of Moscow, has made through Bishop Manning a piteous appeal for funds with which to keep Russian people from starving. The Archbishop tells of terrible sufferings, and the fact that even with help many must die. He feels sure the churches in the United States will help, and writing to the newspapers, and quoting the Moscow confidence, Bishop Manning expresses the same belief.

Community Service to Present Pageant.

A pageant entitled "The Cross Triumphant" and written by Mrs. Minnegerode Andrews will be given on the Cathedral grounds in mid-October for the benefit of St. Mary's School in Raleigh, N. C., said to be the oldest Church school in this country. The pageant depicts the story of the Church in England and America, and will be staged under the direction of Marie Forest, of the District of Columbia Community Service. Lord, we pray Thee that Thy grace may always prevent and follow us, and make us continually to be given to all good works; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

St. Matthew, the Apostle.

O Almighty God, Who by Thy blessed Son didst call Matthew from the receipt of custom to be an Apostle and Evangelist; Grant us grace to forsake all covetous desires, and inordinate love of riches, and to follow the same Thy Son Jesus Christ, Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen.

Awake, O Church of God.

Awake, awake, O Church of God!
Comes now to thee the call
Of Christ, thy Lord, Who bids thee on Till every foe shall fall.
What thought the hosts of darkness stand,
Their last fierce battle make?
The Victor, Christ, He summons thee;
O Church of God, awake!

O Church of God, lose not the day
That now has come to thee;
A world, awaking from its sleep,
Is waiting light to see.
On heathen altars fire burn love,
Forsaken temples are;
Now, now advance, let idols fall,
And Christ be known afar.

The fathers heard; they followed fast,
And eager met the foe,
The prison's chain, the dungeon's gloom,
And drank the cup of woe.
With faith-cleared eye they saw the Lord,
The meaning of His cross;
For mankind's sake, for Jesus' love,
All things they counted loss.

The toil and labor of the years,
Let these not be in vain;
Haste, reap where others sowed in tears,
And weary served in pain.
Thy sons, thy daughters ready are
To dare for Jseus' sake;
O golden hour! what call is thine!
O Church of God, awake!

The Invitation That Went Wrong.

Susan Carpenter stood at the window, watching the wakening garden, where sturdy green shoots were daring to thrust up through the brown mold. A delicately green flush was showing on the hedges, and all nature felt the urge and stir of the spring. April the wonderful couldn't be quite as perfect this year, she pondered, with father and mother, across the ocean, and she herself spending the six months of their absence with Cousin Harriet and her family. They were kind to the reserved fourteen-year-old girl, evidently wanting this young relative to be contented, but their ways were not the ways to which she was accustomed. The wide beautiful world of books and pictures was not a familiar one to them, and it was very much to Susan and her father and mother. Cousin Harriet was a bustling, busy housekeeper who ran her home as if by clockwork. Not a speck of dust on polished chairs and tables or floor. Not a magazine or paper awry on the sitting-room table; all kept in their even piles, and sometimes Susan found herself wishing that everything wouldn't be quite so straight and proper, that a chair might stay in some cozy angle near the fireplace, or that she might see the cheerful unstudied arrangement of books and periodicals, or perhaps a stray basket of fancy work that made their far-off apartment so especially homey. I really believe that not a single cobweb would have dared to intrude, under the eaves, in the Carpenter attic, or a blown leaf presumed to remain on the broad piazza. The Carpenter girls, Dorothy and Muriel, eighteen and twenty, and out of school, were devoted to their clubs and social affairs, and were very far from understanding dreamy-eyed Susan, who eagerly devoured the occasional books that were brought in, to whom study was a delight, and who haunted the village library whenever she could, failing to find much that she wanted.

The library was not a credit to Kingsport, but as Kingsport people didn't seem to mind, few new books were added, and from time to time the covers and backs loosened cheerfully on those that occupied the shelves.

Once, and Susan recalled it today, as she stood alone by the hall window, once an elderly man had come into the library as she was studying the short shelf by the door, Miss Fox, the librarian, had introduced her to Mr. Douglas, and they had had a real visit over books and reading, and he had said, "I'd like to show you my own library, Miss Susan. I believe you'd feel at home there. We must arrange it sometime; I have some interesting volumes. My father before me was a collector of books."

"He has a lovely home on the river road," Miss Fox had remarked primly after the white-haired man had gone, "and he does have rare books. He's very good to this town, too, though he spends only part of his time here."

Just this morning the postman had brought two imposing envelopes to the house. Susan had seen the address on each as she took them into her cousins, "Mrs. William Carpenter," "The Misses Carpenter," and Muriel had exclaimed as she tore theirs open, "So the great Mr. Douglas is entertaining again. He evidently means to, once a year. I'm glad our evening dresses have just been freshened up."

"Yes, it is fortunate," had been Dorothy's reply; "wonder why he sent to the Misses Carpenter this time? It's always been before "Miss Carpenter and Miss Dorothy Carpenter. However, he always does the correct thing."

"I wish," Susan had whispered it to herself, "I wish I might have been invited, too. I'm almost fifteen; it's a musicale, and at home girls of my age are sometimes included," but she went upstairs quietly, hearing Cousin Harriet's big voice saying, "Yes, I'll ask in Miss Forbes to spend the evening with Susan so the child won't be lonely. Miss Forbes will be glad to come, as she's by herself so much. Susan does have a nice way with old people, I've noticed, so it makes it right all around."

So Miss Forbes, the little, frail gentlewoman on the next street, and she, were to be company for each other on the important night! Well, she would try to make it a cheerful evening for the guest, for something about this delicate little old lady appealed to her. They, too, must have some music, and maybe she could make some fudge. She was pretty sure Cousin Harriet wouldn't object.

It was shortly after 7, the night of the musicale, that Miss Forbes arrived, half an hour before the Carpenters were to start, and the little neighbor, who was quite flushed with pleasurable excitement, was wearing her best black silk gown, a trifle worn, but tastefully made, and a quaint amethyst brooch fastened her lace collar. As she welcomed her old friend, Susan tried to forget her own disappointment, saying, "So you and I are to have a little party by ourselves, after all the rest have gone!"

"That sounds very pleasant to me," and Miss Forbes smiled up at the tall girl, "I'm sure the time will be all too short," patting her soft white hair as she spoke, for the cool winds had blown her about as she walked over slowly. A rather sober, but a very deft-fingered Susan helped her cousins into their warm wraps later, and watched them start off in the taxi, talking and laughing together. Oh, why should they not be happy, she wondered, as she returned to her guest. Weren't they going to a musicale in that spacious house, beautiful with its books and furnishings; the sort of home that a cultured man like Mr. Douglas would be sure to have. She had pictured herself, many times, since the meeting, in the library, as happily exploring that book-lined retreat of which he had spoken, discovering her father's and mother's favorites, and finding the ones she had begun to know and love, and now, now she and a demure little old lady must stay quietly at home. while others rode to the palace of delights, for that was how she thought of it. With a quick revulsion of feeling, and half ashamed of her discontent, she set herself to work to be the entertaining hostess.

The house was hers for the evening. Cousin Harriet had smilingly said so, on leaving, and happily did the visitor respond the young girl's mood. She swayed gently to and fro in a low rocking chair as Susan played the old airs that Miss Forbes remembered, "Ben Bolt," "Flow Gently, Sweet Afton," and "The Last Rose of Summer." It was as Susan was about to retire to the kitchen there to make the proposed fudge that the telephone bell in the hall rang insistently, and she hurried to answer it.

"Is this Miss Susan Carpenter?" said a deep voice over the wire, a voice she did not recognize.

"Oh yes, it is," in Susan's most grown-up tone.

"This is Mr. Douglas speaking. Miss Susan, I find that there has been a mistake somewhere. I sent an invitation to my musicale to the Misses Carpenter, and only two of the young ladies came. That invitation included you, you see, and when I found that you were not with your cousins I was quite disappointed. Now, Miss Susan, if I send my car right over will you come at this late hour? The entertainment will have hardly begun, so you will miss but little."

"Oh-h-h-h," through the phone, the one at the other end of the wire smiled to hear the girlish rapture in that simple word. "I'd just love to come, Mr. Douglas; "it would be simply wonderful, but you see I'm afraid I cannot, for Miss Forbes is with me. Cousin Harriet asked her over to keep me company, and we were trying to have a little party just by ourselves. It's dreadful to say no; you don't know how much I want to come," the young voice was not quite steady, "but I'm sure you'll understand, and thank you just the same; oh, thank you."

"Tell me," Mr. Douglas' voice was interested and kind; "isn't that Miss Forbes who is with you the lady that boards at Mrs. Crane's? If she is, I know I've been introduced to her at church. Ask her if she won't come, too. I'll hold the wire."

"Oh, I'll ask her," and laying down the receiver with trembling hands, Susan delivered the message which after a moment's fluttering hesitation the elderly guest was persuaded to accept, adding, "For I can see no impropriety in so doing, and anyway, you could not go over alone in that car at this time of night."

So a very eager voice assured Mr. Douglas that they would be most happy to come, and would be ready to start by the time the car came.

It was a blissfully happy pair that were received by their beaming host later in the dark, wainscoted hall, and who gave over their wraps to an obsequious maid, and took their places in the well-filled drawing-room, where at the piano a famous artist was playing marvelously a tender theme that brought tears to Susan's eyes, and seemed to bear her away beyond the sea to where were the ones dearest to her. But it was in the library afterwards that Susan's joy was complete, and her host shared her evident delight in the carefully selected volumes which she touched with reverent fingers, gladly accepting his offer to borrow some of the books that she had longed for. In the softly lighted dining-room, all the Carpenters meeting, many were the laughing explanations to neighbors and friends, and Miss Forbes joined in the merriment, too, her cheeks happily flushed as a girl's.

"Why, Susan never changed her gown," Muriel whispered to Dorothy in a shocked tone.

"It doesn't matter," Dorothy studied her cousin almost as if she were an interesting stranger. Susan was standing rapt and silent before a great water color that hung over the dining-room fire-place, an autumn study in rich, dark tones. "That simple brown velveteen seems to suit her somehow, and you know, Muriel, she fits into this sort of house with its music, books and pictures. She belongs here more than we do. Mother says her father and mother are just like that, sort of different. Honestly, I'm glad she came; it would have been a shame if she'd have missed it."

"Yes, and she will come again," was the response. "Mr. Douglas told mother that Susan was a most unusual girl."

And Susan did come again, I'm glad to say, and sometimes little Miss Forbes came with her, until the great house and all it held grew delightfully familiar. "And to think if you hadn't called me up that evening, Mr. Douglas, how much I would have missed," exclaimed Susan rapturously, long afterward, when the two had become really old friends.

"And how much I, too, would have missed, my dear," returned her host, "for you have brought much brightness into an old man's life. And all because an invitation that went wrong was put right on a certain April evening."—Alix Thorn, in The Presbyterian Banner.

Let Us Not Be Narrow.

Generally speaking, the happiest and most contented people are those who, while deeply engrossed in the work that fills their days, yet take time to forget it and to show appreciation of another's work or play. These are the generous ones who not only recognize ability and usefulness in others, but who glory in it.

Is it not perhaps true that in the Church's work we are all more than usually liable to this great fault of not being able to see and appreciate the other person's work and usefulness? Each of us is engrossed in his own, and often we will not even take time to discover what other organizations are for, not to mention the detailed facts that reveal their usefulness and that of their members.

Many parishes are now making their annual meetings, gatherings at which the various organizations report their work in a vivid and interesting manner. We recall a parish in a Southern city, however, that has gone even further than this by having an all-day exhibit on a week day, at which each organization in the parish has its booth under the supervision of a capable and interesting representative. Everybody is asked to visit this parish exhibition, to call at the various booths, learn what is possible, and take away literature for further study. In the evening a general parish meeting is held with a service appropriate to the occasion.

It is almost impossible, save by unusual methods of this kind, so far to gain the attention of our people that they may learn what others are doing. But if such information could be acquired, not only would it inspire all engaged in the general work of the Church, by interesting them in all its departments, but it would have a helpful and inspiring influence on the special duty that each is engaged in.—St Andrew's Cross.

The steamer was going down the St Lawrence. The passengers knew that the river, though wide, was dotted with numerous islands between which the tawny flood poured with almost irresistible force. To make matters worse, a clammy fog wrapped river and steamer alike in its ghostly shroud. The passengers on deck observed with alarm that the vessel nevertheless ploughed steadily on her course with unabated speed. Finally, they sent one of their number to question the captain. "It's all right," he said when he returned. "I met the mate just coming down from the bridge, and he says that up where the captain is there isn't any fog. It just seems to be clinging to the surface of the river and the lower part of the boat."

Well would it be for all of us if on the voyage of life we should always bear in mind that up where our Captain is there is no fog! In the fog in which we live there are many things to perplex and frighten us. Every day life puts to us questions that we cannot answer. Every day we must solve problems of conduct and decide on courses of action the ultimate consequences of which we cannot foresee. Shall we go in this direction or in that? Sometimes we are like men without a compass and cannot tell whether we are speeding toward the safe channel or toward the rocks and shoals.

And sometimes the fog is the fog of religious doubt. It hangs persistently over that sea of material things on which we spend our lives. It blinds our vision and terrifies our souls until sometimes we cry in despair that the only thing we can be sure of is the bit of plank on which we stand. As we glide on through the darkness we wonder whether after all we can be sure of anything except what we can see and touch and feel. We know we are out in midstream. We can feel the relentless grip of the current as it hurries us on. What if we lose the bit of plank beneath our feet? The shoals and the rocks are never far away.

Why should we not rise above the fog? We can do it. By enduring poverty or pain, by studying God's Word, by doing kindness to others or by praying with humbleness of heart, we can rise above it. Up where our Captain is there is no fog. The doubts and the perplexities that dismay the unbeliever and the man who loves the world never trouble him who lives close to God. His eye discerns the channel, knows the place of every rock, where the currents run swiftly and where the waters are tranquil and still. Why not trust Him to guide us? Today, as of old, he who trusts God may hear his voice saying, "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee."—Selected.

Prosperity.

They tell me thou art rich, my country: gold
In glittering flood has poured into thy chest;
Thy flocks and herds increase, thy barns are pressed
With harvest, and thy stores can hardly hold
Their merchandise; unending trains are rolled
Along thy network rails east and west;
Thy factories and forges never rest;
Thou art rich in all things bought and sold.

But dost thou prosper? Better news I crave.
O dearest country, is it well with thee
Indeed, and is thy soul in health?
A nobler people, hearts more wisely brave,
And thoughts that lift men up and make them free
These are prosperity and vital wealth.

—Henry Van Dyke.

The Lesson of the Palm Tree.

The Arabs have a saying about the palm tree that it stands with its feet in salt water and its head in the sun. They often cannot drink of the brackish water found in the oasis where the palm grows; but they tap the tree and drink the sweet palm wine. The palm tree, by the magic of its inner life, can so change the elements found in the unkindly soil around it that they minister to its growth and strength and fruit-bearing. So you and I, in our earthly life, must often have our feet in the mire and bitterness of sin around us; and upon our heads will often beat the fierce heat of temptation. But in spite of these things we shall be able to grow and grow strong, rejecting the evil and assimilating the good, if within us there is the making of a new life through Jesus Christ.—Christian Work.

For the Young Folks

The Few.

The easy roads are crowded;
And the level roads are jammed;
The pleasant little rivers
With the drifting folks are crammed.
But off yonder where it's rocky,
Where you get a better view,
You will find the ranks are thinning
And the travelers are few.

Where the going's smooth and pleasant
You will always find the throng,
For the many, more's the pity,
Seem to like to drift along.
But the steeps that call for courage,
And the task that's hard to do
In the end results in glory
For the never-wavering few.

The Silver Thimble.

By Norena J. Snell.

Elizabeth sat in her little red rocking-chair, sewing and singing softly to herself, as her shining needle flew in and out of the white cloth. She was out on the front lawn, under the sweet apple tree, and her two dolls, Mary Belle and Susan, had been placed on the soft grass where they could lean against the tree trunk.

"Just as soon as I get your new apron done, my dear, you may put it on," announced Elizabeth as she smiled down at Mary Belle, a large wax doll with golden hair and very blue eyes.

Mary Belle must have been very anxious for her new apron to be finished, but she was a well-behaved child, and continued to sit very straight and still while her little mother sewed.

Susan, a plump little doll in a long red cape and hood, very much like Red Riding Hood's, tumbled over to one side, and stared sulkily at the ground. I guess she was jealous because she was not to have a new apron also.

It was such a pretty apron—white, with a tiny ruffle of lace, and the cutest little pockets, each with a tiny bow of pink ribbon upon it. It was an apron any doll might be proud to wear.

"There!" exclaimed Elizabeth, with a little sigh of satisfaction as she carefully snipped the thread with her small pair of scissors: "there, Mary Belle, your apron is done! Come here and I will put it on you."

Just as she finished tying the strings a little girl with flying hair came running across the lawn.

"Oh, Elizabeth!" she cried, "Uncle Tom is going to town with the car and says we may go, too! Do hurry and get your hat!"

Elizabeth sat Mary Belle hurriedly down by the tree and jumped to her feet.

"How lovely!" she exclaimed. "I know mother will let me go. But first I'll have to pick up my things, so do help me, Frances, and then it won't take so long."

"All right," agreed Frances, and proceeded to tumble spools, scissors and bits of cloth into Elizabeth's work-box, helter-skelter.

"Did you pick up my thimble?" asked Elizabeth, coming back from carrying her rocking-chair and dolls to the porch.

"Yes—no—I don't know, but I guess so," answered Frances. "I'll look and see," but although she tumbled everything else out and even turned the little work-box upside down and shook it, she failed to find the thimble.

"Oh, dear!" she wailed, "where can it be? It must have fallen out of your lap when you jumped up so quick." So both children got down on the ground and looked, but although they searched all around the tree, they could not find the silver thimble.

Elizabeth's face was very sober.

"I've got to find it, Frances," she said. "I just won't enjoy my ride one bit if I don't find that first. Let's look again." And once more they searched all around the tree, but still the thimble was not to be found.

"Do come, anyway, Elizabeth," begged Frances. "It won't be any fun without you, and when we come back I'll help you hunt some more."

"All right," agreed Elizabeth, but not very happily. "But first I must take the dolls up to my room; mother doesn't like me to leave them on the front porch."

"And I'll hunt some more while you are gone," said Frances, who was sorry for her friend, for she knew how much Elizabeth thought of her thimble, which had been a birthday gift just a month ago. So she began to carefully search once more, and was just looking beneath a dandelion leaf when she heard Elizabeth call, "Frances, Frances! come here, quick!" in such a glad voice that Frances scrambled to her feet and started for the porch as fast as she could go.

"Look!" exclaimed Elizabeth, "here is my thimble in Mary Belle's apron pocket! It must have fallen in there when she was in my lap! You bad Mary Belle!" she added, giving the doll a little shake. "Aren't you ashamed to have carried it off in your pocket and not tell me? After I had worked so hard for you, too! But never mind," giving her a loving hug, "you could not talk, could you, poor thing!"

And then, after having carried the dolls upstairs, the children hurried away to the waiting car and Uncle Tom, still laughing at the joke Mary Belle had played upon them.—Presbyterian Banner.

The Little Flower Seed.

Listen! What was that?

Why, it sounds like a little sniff! There it is again!

It comes from that little flower-pot, that has nothing in it—at least, nothing but some dirt.

Dirt, indeed! Why, sure enough, a little flower seed was planted in that pot, and—there's that sniff again. "It's a great big shame!" I heard a tiny little bit of a voice say, "that's all there is to it!

"They stick me down here in the dirt, and then forget me, and never once think I get thirsty!" And the little flower seed sniffed again. Could it be crying?

"If you'd hurry up and sprout, so they could see you, it would remind them to water you," said the Red Geranium.

"Well, I'm doing my best," replied the little seed. "I've split my seed and have put my hands out, and"—

"Your roots, don't you mean?" interrupted a fern.

"No, my hands, and I'm holding on to the earth as hard as ever I can with them," snapped the seed.

"But how can I put up my shoots and grow if they won't help me? I'll die of thirst," it added.

Poor little seed; its soil was hard and dry all around it—it certainly could not grow that way.

But the next day it was watered. Dear me! how it did drink and drink, and the water bubbled and gurgled as it soaked down in the pot.

I'll tell you, that little seed felt good, and it also felt so strong it pushed its little green nose right up through the earth.

And it peeped up at Red Geranium at its side—so this was the world? My! but it was nice to be out of the dark earth.

"I'm glad now I just held on, and wouldn't die," the little seed said to itself. "It pays, after all, to have patience," it added.

Well, this little seed wasn't a little seed any longer, for it grew and grew, and now that it had at last pushed up, it was not forgotten.

"Just as I told you," said the Red Geranium. "It is our own fault if we are forgotten and passed over. If we make ourselves worthy of notice, we will get it.

"Just look at my gorgeous red blossoms," he continued. "How could any one pass me by when I do my very best and grow such beauties?"

How could they, indeed?

But the little seed had learned its lesson, and it tried its hardest to grow and thrive, for was this not a most beautiful world, and was it not nice to be able to help add to its beauty?

And it did, for one day there was a yellow blossom, proudly holding up its head, and then another, and another, and they all were the children of that discouraged seed!

But it wasn't a seed any longer; it was a plant, if you please, of beauty and importance, because it had decided it would be ashamed to be in this lovely world and not do its share in beautifying it!—Child's Gem.

Hilly-I-Over.

One summer day Sidney Brown and Stephen Earle ran down to the tool-house to play a favorite game of theirs called hilly-I-over. Sidney took his stand behind the tool-house and Stephen stood in front of it, and the game began.

One of the boys would throw a rubber ball up to the roof, just hard enough and high enough for it to clear the ridgepole and fall on the other side. As he threw it he would sing out, "Hilly-I-over!"

The other player would catch the ball as it came down. If it did not go over the ridgepole, the thrower would call, "Not quite o-o-o-ver!" Then he would count one off his score and try again.

After the two boys had played for about ten minutes, Sidney missed.

"Not quite o-o-o-ver!" he called.

"Oho!" came Stephen's voice from the other side. "That's the very first time the ball's gone back!"

Sidney did not like that; he wished he had not been the first one to miss.

"I won't miss again!" he called. "You'll do well if you catch the ball this time!" He braced himself and threw with all his might—so hard, in fact, that he twisted himself clear round and went down in a heap. Scrambling to his feet, he stood alert, ready for Stephen's call of "Hilly-I-over!"

But instead of giving the familiar call Stephen shouted, "Why didn't you call 'not quite over'?"

"Because it did go over, didn't it?" Sidney answered.

Stephen peered round the corner of the tool-house. "Of course it didn't,"

he said. "If it had I'd have given you the hail."

"Well, I did throw it pretty hard," Sidney confessed. "It must have gone over your head."

For fifteen minutes they searched the whole lot, but in vain. When Stephen's supper bell began to ring they stopped, hot and tired, and looked at each other sadly.

"Just listen to those Baltimore orioles in the old elm," Sidney said. "You'd think they had lost a ball—or something. I never heard such a racket."

High up among the branches of the tall old elm that stood just beside the tool-house a great fluttering and scolding was going on.

"They don't like to have us play so close to them," Stephen said. "But they don't own the lot, though they sound as if they thought they did."

Next morning Sidney and Stephen made another search. But the ball had disappeared as completely as if the sky or the ground had swallowed it.

"Those orioles have stopped scolding," Sidney said, as he paused to wipe his face. "They'll be glad, anyway, if we don't play here for a while."

The boys saved their pennies, bought a new ball, and soon forgot all about the old one and about the nervous orioles.

In September there was a great storm; the wind blew all night long, and when morning came the ground was strewn with fallen branches.

Sidney came over to look at the damage that had been done and to help Stephen drag away some of the branches.

He was tugging at a huge limb when all at once he called out, "Come here and look at this." Then he added, "Well, upon my word!"

Stephen came hurrying to his side.

"Look," said Sidney. He parted the thick leaves and pointed to a bedraggled object. "It's the orioles' nest," he said. "And will you believe it: here's our ball!"

He thrust his hand into the pocket-shaped nest and brought out the ball, which was covered with trash and bits of eggshell.

Stephen stared. "You did give it a toss that day, now, didn't you?" he said. "The poor orioles! I don't wonder they scolded."

"Or that they left," Sidney added. "When I come to think about it, I never have heard them here since the day we lost the ball."

The following spring the boys saw the birds building in another tree; but as for the ball, the first time they used it in a game of hilly-I-over they lost it again and never found it.

"How pleased the orioles would be!" said the boys. "They'd think it served us right."—Minnie Upton, in Youth's Companion.

Tom's Gold Dust.

"That boy knows how to take care of his gold dust," said Tom's uncle to himself and sometimes aloud.

Tom went to college, and every account they heard of him he was going ahead, laying a solid foundation for the future.

"Certainly," said his uncle; "certainly. That boy, I tell you, knows how to take care of his gold dust."

"Gold dust?" Where did Tom get gold dust? Ah! He had seconds, minutes; and these are the gold dust of time—which boys and girls and grown-up people are apt to waste and throw away. Tom knew their value. His father had taught him that every particle of time was worth its weight in gold, and his son took care of it as if it were. Take care of your gold dust.—Selected.

Before the Rain.

Clouds are dusky gray and still,
  Nature's waiting for the rain;
Birds have ceased their song until
  They can feel the sun again.

Trees are waiting, patient, too,
  Hushed and silent as they stand,
Till the breeze comes sailing through
  Fresh'ning all the weary land.

Water's rippling like a song
  Where the willows bend above,
Gently coaxing it along
  With a tender mother love.

The long grasses lilt and sway
  To the music's mystic flow,
In a dance of elfish play
  Mirrored in the stream below.

Sentinel poplars, straight and tall,
  Upward turn their shining leaves,
And the tree toads scrape and call
  In a tune that oddly grieves.

There's a brooding tenderness
  That's so sweet it starts a pain
Yearning through and through your breast,
  Then—here comes the driving rain.

—Grace G. Bostwick.

Charlie's Good Idea.

"Oh, Charlie dear, don't make such a noise with your drum!"

"Why not, Kitty? I'm a soldier home from the war," and six-year-old Charlie strutted up and down the nursery, beating his drum harder than ever.

Kitty tried to go on reading her pretty story-book, but in vain. "You forget mamma has a headache," she said, looking rather cross.

"Oh, yes, so I did," said Charlie; "I won't do it any more," and he was quiet as a mouse.

"Can't we have a game of soldiers, Kitty?" he asked at last.

"No; it's too noisy."

"The game I mean isn't noisy. I could be a soldier in the hospital, and you the nurse reading to me," said Charlie. Kitty laughed; but all the same she agreed, and she found that in pleasing her little brother she was happier than when reading her pretty story to herself.—Our Little Tots.

Pie-Crust Promises.

"Now, you promise to be there promptly?" insisted the first girl speaker.

"Oh, yes, I promise," carelessly agreed the girl who had just been invited on the trip for the morrow. But the other girl was not quite satisfied yet.

"Well, now, promise me that you'll keep your promise," she demanded laughtingly. "For you know as well as I do, Estelle, that your promises are not always the guaranteed all-wool kind."

Rather a sorry thing to say to any one, even in a joking way, was it not? And all the worse because the one accused could not, and did not, resent it. It was the truth, and she knew it. Worst of all was the act that she did not think of resenting it, because she did not care that it was true.

Promises are more serious things than that. A promise, once given, should stand as good as the actual performance. A promise should never be made unless the one who makes it is as sure that he can and will fulfil it as he can be sure of anything.

The safe rule for all to follow is twofold. First to think and be sure of the possibility of performance, before making any promise. Second, when that is done, and the promise made, to let nothing make you break it—nothing that lies within your power to prevent.

If you stop, think, make sure, before you promise, you will train yourself to careful, conscientious habits in giving your word. If you make good the promises so made, as you will in the natural order of things, you will train your friends to know that your promises are guaranteed "all truth," if not all wool.—Pleasant Hours.

Little Louise.

I've a sampler worked by Great-Great-Aunt Louise;
  It's framed and hangs by my bed.
There's a cross-stitch picture of stiff green trees,
  And the Lord's Prayer, done in red;
Then the Fifth Commandment (the one I love,
  About honoring father and mother),
And a fancy alphabet worked above,
  And then, over that, another.
And in faded silken letters of gold,
  As fine and neat as you please,
Are the date and the words, "At nine years old,
  Wrought by little Louise."

Little Louise! poor little Louise!
  Two years younger than I,
Yet if I had to sew such things as these,
  I think I should almost die!
I'm sure she was dreadfully prim and good,
  And sat with her hands just so,
With her hair slicked down on her head like wood,
  Or stiff curls all in a row.
She never would giggle or romp or play,
  Or ever be naughty or tease,
But just sew patiently day by day—
  "Wrought by little Louise."

Then Great-Grandmother told me of little Louise
  And what do you think she said?
"My dear, that child was the greatest tease,
  And her hair was fluffy and red!
She hated to sew, and pouted and cried
  Before that sampler was made;
And when it was done, she ran outside
  And shouted and romped and played."
To think that a little girl just like me
  Worked all those letters and trees.
That sampler's precious as it can be—
  "Wrought by little Louise."

Ah Chee Wakes Up.

Ah Chee sat before his father's food shop, thinking so deeply that his little round face looked quite solemn. He was thinking about devils and their ways. From his baby days, when his parents had dressed him in girl's clothes and called him "Dirt" to fool the devils, up to his present ripe age of eight, devils had been a great source of annoyance to Ah Chee. Although they were guarded against in every possible way, they were constantly interfering, and just at this time they had sent a bad sickness which had visited many homes. Only the foreigners in the neighborhood had escaped, and this was the thing that puzzled Ah Chee, for it was common talk that foreigners laughed at devils. Ah Chee resolved to seek out the foreigners and discover their devil-conquering charm.

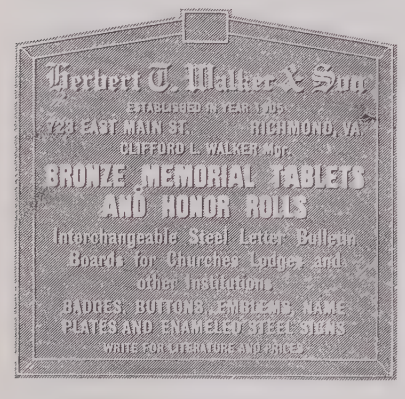
He brushed the flies from a sweetmeat and nibbled it as he trotted down the street to where a crowd had gathered. Squirming his way expertly to the front, Ah Chee gave one look, then whirled round and tried to dive back through the sea of legs, for he found himself confronting an enormous fly—at least, a hundred times as big as the flies he knew. It was shining, moreover, as if it had a fire inside. The horrid creature stood on a little wheeled platform, and behind it were more horrors—other bugs and dragons, all huge and all red with that dreadful light.

Suddenly Ah Chee understood. These were devils that the foreigners had captured. He listened attentively. Yes, the foreigners admitted it, and they admitted, too, that they knew a way to conquer them. How foolish, thought Ah Chee, to give away such valuable information. For the foreigners, acting for the Junior American Red Cross, were telling in detail how to fight the disease-spreading devils.

Ah Chee could hardly believe his ears. Apparently all that was needed was to wash things and then to keep them covered from flies.

The foreigners continued to talk about a great tong to which they belonged. This tong, which they called "Juniorredcross," was hunting disease devils all over the city and had enlisted in its service numbers of homeless beggar boys which it turned into street cleaners.

But this did not interest Ah Chee. Chuckling, he hurried off home to tell his father the astounding news that devils were stupid things that could be overcome by soap and water and screens.—Junior Red Cross News.



Companionship.

Companionship with God and with our fellowmen who are of a kindred mind is an inestimable privilege. It has an ennobling effect upon character and life. It brings the individual in contact with the noblest elements in God and redeemed men. It affords rare privileges and choice associations. There is no more sacred tie that can unite saved men with God and with one another than fellowshipping together in consecrated service and enjoying mutual courtesies and love made pure. It is a supreme privilege to be associated with God and with choice spirits amony men who are united with God in the holy tie of fellowship.

Enoch walked with God over three hundred years, and so intimate was the relationship that one day Enoch was not on earth because God took him to Himself without seeing death. As a venerable bishop once declared, "When death had turned its face Tnoch slipped by and entered heaven." At all events, walking with God in constant fellowship gave him the assurance that he pleased God and prepared him at any moment to be taken to heaven. His name and his beautiful life are remembered when the choice saints are tabulated in Hebrews 12.

Such sacred companionship becomes an indescribable inspiration and links one with powers that always make for righteousness and the spreading of the kingdom of Christ on earth. It imparts to the soul a special leverage of power and efficiency in winning men to Christ. especially by an exemplary life and chaste conversation. How the New Testament saints cultivated spiritual companionship. How Paul loved to commune with his co-workers and with his converts to Christianity. His epistles are full of expressed longing for the privilege, and when enjoyed, of expressions of appreciation of the sacred fellowship.

It has always been so with wholehearted Christians, and will always remain so. It is an inner bond of love and fellowship that cannot be described but enjoyed, that always enriches mind and heart. It is this that sweetens many bitter draughts that Christians have to drink. It helps while passing over rough places in life by stimulating courage.—The Evangelical Messenger.

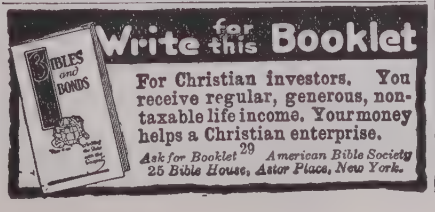
The Work You Do.

By Lois Dana Gould.

A girl was apologizing to a friend for an exhibition of ill-nature a few evenings before. "The fact is, I get dreadfully tired and then my nerves get beyond my control. I think it's the sort of work I do. It's very monotonous. You see—"

We can allow the speaker to stop right there with her excuses. Monotonous work! Whatever her occupation, she might have said the same. Take the seamstress, stitching up the long seams, turning a hem, sewing on buttons, day in and day out. The household worker has beds every morning, dishes three times a day. Then there's the telephone girl. "Number, please. Black, 4168-W. The line's busy." Think of keeping that up all day and every day. Or the girl at the typewriter, bringing down her fingers on the keys, click, click, click.

A humorist whose work brings him large financial returns bought a country place recently. He hires a gardener, of course, more than one, in fact, but he spends considerable time working in his vegetable garden. "I just have to do it," he explained to a friend; "I need to relax my mind and limber up my body. My work is so monotonous, you see." He has made a fortune making people laugh, and he is noted for his originality and the freshness of his humor, but his cry is the same—monotony.



But there is another side "The reason I like housework," said one smiling girl, who keeps house while her mother fills a salaried position, "is that there's so much variety. There's breakfast and then the dishes and then sweeping and dusting and making the beds, and then going to market. It's so different from doing the same thing over and over." Instead of complaining that she has to wash dishes three times a day, this worker was thankful that she did not have to wash them all day.

It was a young sewing girl who defended her work against the charge of monotony. "No two dresses are just the same," she said. "And even if they were, the people who wear them are different. I always get quite excited over making a real pretty dress. If I make a success of it, I'm just as pleased as my customer."

Thus is it made plain that monotony is not in the work we are doing, but in the spirit in which we do it. For monotony is not on the outside; it is the state of mind. If we want to take the monotony out of our work, we must change ourselves.—Selected.

"He That Doeth Shall Know."

Here we are in a world of mystery, where all is difficult, and very much dark—where a hundred jarring creeds declare themselves to be the truth, and all are plausible. How shall a man decide? Let him do the right that lies before him. Whatever else may be wrong, it must be right to be pure—to be just and tender, and merciful and honest. It must be right to love and to deny one's self. Let him do the will of God, and he shall know.—F. W. Robertson.

Whiting: Passed into the Eternal Rest at Prospect Hill, Clarke County, Va., MRS. MARIA PAGE WHITING, aged seventy-five years, daughter of Francis Burwell and Mary Mann Meade, granddaughter of Bishop Meade, of Virginia, and widow of F. B. Whiting, of Edgewood. Buried at the Old Chapel, Millwood, Va.

MILDRED THRIFT BIRCKHEAD.

MILDRED THRIFT BIRCKHEAD, oldest child of Dr. Edward Francis Birckhead and his wife, Cornelia Rachel Magruder Graves, was born June 8, 1847, at Morven, Albemarle County, Va., and died July 22, 1921.

A devoted daughter, sister and friend, she was so quiet and reserved in disposition that her liberality and many self-sacrifices were known only to the few with whom she was brought in contact.

For a number of years she served her State as a public school teacher, and her memory is held in reverent esteem by the men and women upon whose character she left a lasting imprint for good.

A faithful member of the Episcopal Church for fifty-eight years, she was ready for the summons, Enter thou into the joys of thy Lord, and gladly obeyed it when it came.

WILLIAM NELSON MEADE.

WILLIAM NELSON MEADE, minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, son of Francis Burwell and Mary Mann Meade, of Prospect Hill, and grandson of Bishop William Meade, died of heart failure at Edgewood, in Clarke County, Va., the night of Friday, September 2. Death came after a long life devoted to Christ's service, and with a touch, soft and gentle, wrought instant transition, without pain, without struggle, with a peace prophetic, to the Life Unknown.

The death of the Rev. Mr. Meade marks the passing of the fifth and last grandson of Bishop Meade to devote his life to the Church. These grandsons of the Virginian prelate were: The Rev. Drs. Philip Nelson and Edward Meade, sons of Philip Nelson Meade, his oldest son; the Rev. Dr. William H. Meade and the Rev. Francis A. Meade, sons of the Rev. Richard Kidder Meade, and the Rev. William Nelson Meade, son of the Bishop's youngest son.

Mr. Meade was born at Prospect Hill in February, 1854. There he spent a boyhood filled with memories of the Civil War, the march and counter-march of armies, the clash of battle, with fleeting glimpses of his oldest brothers; the one a staff officer of Stonewall Jackson, the other a cavalryman of J. E. B. Stuart.

He was an alumnus of the University of Virginia and a graduate of the Virginia Theological Seminary. His first charge after ordination was a parish in Fairfax County; his next, old Hungar's Parish, in Northampton County, where he built a church at Cape Charles; in 1903 he took charge of the church in the city of Anderson, S. C., and late in 1904 he accepted a call to the historic South Farnum Parish, in Essex County, Va., and labored there until his death.

On October 6, 1887, he married Louise Porcher Allston, daughter of Mary North and Captain Joseph Blyth Allston, C. S. A., of South Carolina. She was a devoted wife and ably assisted him in his labors for the Church. Her death in Anderson, February 1, 1904, wrecked his health and caused his return to his native State.

A minister of the gospel for more than half his sixty-six years, one one summarizes his life—Service. He served his God; he served his parishioners; he served his family, his friends and the stranger within his gates. Peculiarly without thought of personal advancement, he gave of himself and all that was his for the pure joy of giving, and cared not for recompense. To his friends and to principles he gave passionate and unfaltering loyalty.

From Bishop Meade he had inherited of that prelate's sternness of conviction; of his contempt for temporizing with wrong; of his outspoken championing of right. So, like his distinguished grandfather, William Nelson Meade trod the path of duty as he saw it with firm and unquestioning step—unafraid; he evaded nor cared to evade a single responsibility, public or private; he followed the dictates of his conscience without fear or favor, and left to God the rest. But his heart and his hand were open to every appeal; he passed through life with a simple sincerity, an uprightness, a steadfulness that insured him the esteem of all and sincere affection from many. Of him one of his congregation has ably and truly written: "He was peculiarly fitted to administer comfort to the suffering half his sixty-six years, one word sum-and the bereaved, and he exercised this was beautiful indeed. Pure in life, steadfast in purpose, liberal but of strong convictions, his life was a great influence for good in this community, and will leave its impress in the years to come. Like the Apostle Paul, he has fought a good fight; he has kept the faith. The memory of his life is a benediction."

Suffering from a fatal disease, knowing full well that each day might verily be his last, he resolutely refused to yield his post of duty, but labored on, performing every duty of his parish, uncomplaining and unsparing of himself. He labored on until Death came and found him, as it was his wish that it should be, still at his post—and led him gently to the distant shore, where is the Life Eternal.

The Rev. Mr. Meade was a Delta Psi. He is survived by one brother, Francis Key Meade, of Prospect Hill. A few hours before his death the remains of his sister, Mrs. Maria Page Whiting, of Edgewood, were laid to rest at the Old Chapel.

There he, too, now lies.

late Dr. Charles Minnegerode, rector for thirty-eight years of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, and beloved by all who knew him. His rectorate covered the eventful years of the War Between the States and the reconstruction period, and he ministered as rector to both Jefferson Davis and Robert E. Lee. Mrs. Andrews is well known in Washington for her art work and her readiness to help in philanthropic and other works for Church and educational advancement.

Christian healing services are being held regularly in the Diocese at St. Stephen's and Epiphany Churches. These services are well attended and have been held in these two parishes continuously since the visit of Mr. Hickson to Washington.

The Rev. Thom Williamson, Jr., rector of the Church of the Advent, has returned from his vacation, having accompanied the reserve fleet on a fifteen-day training cruise. Since Mr. Williamson took charge of this parish in May much new equipment has been added to the church, including a new organ, an enlarged chancel, new lights, a supply of new Prayer Books and Hymnals and a new Bible of the American Standard Version for use on the lectern.

The Rev. David R. Covell, rector of Trinity Community Church, has returned from his vacation and assumed his regular duties again. During his absence the work of Trinity Church was carried on by the Rev. Raymond Wolven and the activities of the Community House by the Rev. John McDonald. The Rev. Mr. Wolven remains to do the prisoners' aid work and to assist in the city missionary work, with headquarters at Trinity Community House.

The Rev. Charles T. Warren, rector of St. Alban's Church, is spending his vacation with his family in the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia, but expects to return to the city in time for his Sunday services on Sunday, September 18.

The preacher at the people's open-air service, Washington Cathedral, on Sunday, September 11, was the Rev. H. D. Phillips, D. D., from the University of the South, Sewanee, Tenn.

The Rev. Dr. James E. Freeman, rector of Epiphany Church, has returned to the city and was the preacher at both of the services at Epiphany Church on Sunday, September 11.

NEWARK

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor

Clerical Changes.

Several changes among the clergy in the Diocese of Newark are to be recorded. The Rev. Addison T. Doughty, from Western New York, has taken charge of St. Alban's and St. George's, Newark; the Rev. Benjamin C. De Camp has come from Long Island to take care of the Church of the Ascension, Bloomfield; the Rev. Paul Roberts, of Holy Trinity, West Orange, has accepted a call to the Cathedral at Boise, Idaho; the Rev. James H. S. Fair, of Bernardsville, has accepted a call to a school chaplaincy and a rectorship in Rhode Island; the Rev. Dr. Fleming James, of Englewood, has accepted a professorship at Berkeley Divinity School; the Rev. W. O. Leslie, of Jersey City, has taken work in the Newark City Mission, with charge of Christ Church, Newark; the Rev. Donald Wonders, for some years an assistant at Trinity Cathedral, Newark, has accepted a call to Mt. Vernon, O.; the Rev. H. W. Gernand, of Millburn, has accepted a call to the Diocese of Pennsylvania; the Rev. Charles S. Armstrong, some time a curate at St. Paul's, Paterson, has taken charge of St. Matthew's Church, Jersey City; the Rev. Worcester Perkins has become rector of St. John's Church, Jersey City, and the Rev. A. P. Knell has removed from East Rutherford to have charge of St. John's, Hasbrouck Heights.

LOS ANGELES.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Johnson, D. D., Bishop
Rev. W. B. Stevens, Ph. D., Coadjutor-Elect.

Work Among Sailors, Soldiers and Marines.

On Wednesday, August 31, a new work for sailors, soldiers and marines was formally opened in San Diego under the auspices of the Diocesan Commission on Seamen's Work. Chaplain Frank Thompson, U. S. N. (retired), is in charge. He has shown the same organizing ability in beginning this work that he showed as head of the chaplain corps at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station during the war. A fine large hall has been secured in Balboa Park, which is always open. Addresses were made at the opening exercises by Bishop Stevens, Admiral Roger Wells and Chaplain Thompson. There were present also Mayor Bacon, of San Diego; Admiral Burrage, of the destroyer fleet, Chaplains Park and Lash and many of the local clergy and laity.

Funeral services for Mrs. A. C. Stilson, late wife of the Rev. Dr. A. C. Stilson, were held at St. John's Church, Los Angeles, Monday, August 22, Bishop Stevens officiating, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Harwood Huntington, the Rev. J. A. Evans and the Rev. J. C. Ingham. Mrs. Stilson was active in the work of the Auxiliary and other women's organizations in the Diocese.

PITTSBURGH

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Names of Teachers and Students Wanted.

The Board of Religious Education of the Diocese of Pittsburgh is endeavoring, through its Committee on Schools and Colleges, to bring in touch with the clergy the students and teachers from elsewhere who are coming to the Diocese to live and to work in the various institutions of learning. Will any of the clergy who have friends or parishioners coming to the Diocese please write, giving names and addresses, to the chairman of the Committee on Schools and Colleges, 317 Jenkins Building, Pittsburgh, Pa.

When a man can willingly forego the outward services of religion, and stay away from the house of God, and let the seasons of devotion and communion pass by without a thought of regret, his faith and love must be at a low ebb. A living plant seeks water; a living soul longs for the refreshment of the sanctuary.—H. Van Dyke.

Personal Notes

The Rev. George Boate, curate at the Church of the Resurrection, Philadelphia, has resigned to accept the call to become rector of St. Thomas' Church, Glassboro, N. J., with the Good Shepherd Mission at Pitman. After October 1 his address will be St. Thomas' Rectory, Glassboro, N. J.

The Rev. Charles F. Scofield has resigned as rector of the Church of the Atonement, Morton, Pa., and minister in charge of St. James' Church, Prospect Park, and has accepted the rectorship of St. James' Church, Perkiomen (Evansburg), with residene at Collegeville, Pa.

After September 15 the Bishop Coadjutor of Los Angeles, the Rt. Rev. W. B. Stevens, Ph. D., should be addressed 2277 South Hobart Boulevard or 523 South Olive Street, Los Angeles.

The Rev. James D. Gibson, of St. Stephen's Church, Westhampton, Richmond, Va., has left for his new home in Covington, Ky., where he will assume charge as rector of Trinity Church on October 1, and his address after September 20 will be 369 Garrard Avenue, Cofington, Ky. Mr. Gibson leaves many friends in the Diocese of Virginia who regret to see him go; but the loss of one diocese is the gain of another, and Lexington is to be congratulated upon this addition to her roster of clergy.

What will it avail thee to dispute sublimely of the Trinity, if thou be void of humility, and art thereby displeasing to the Trinity? Truly sublime words do not make a man holy and just: but a virtuous life maketh him dear to God. I had rather feel compunction than know the definition thereof. If thou didst know the whole Bible and the sayings of all the philosophers by heart, what would that profit thee without the love of God?—Thomas a Kempis.

Think of sin as a mistake, or as an inconvenience, and you stand in great danger, first, of compromising with it, and second, of using low and even sinful methods of opposing it. But think of sin as a frightful wrong in itself, a blot and curse in the universe of God, and you grow absolutely intolerant of it, and at the same time watchfully anxious about the nature of the weapons which you shall use to fight it with.—Phillips Brooks.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., SEPTEMBER 24, 1921. No. 39.

THE WANING OF THE "KU KLUX KLAN"

Recent events, particularly the public repudiation of the order by one of its officers in North Carolina, tend to show that the disintegration of the so-called Ku Klux Klan may be beginning. Already in these columns we have expressed our opposition to this Klan, and our belief that it would soon disillusion and alienate many people who had at first joined it. It may be well to outline in one statement, and as explicitly as we can, the grounds on which our conviction rests.

We do not know all the principles and program of the Ku Klux Klan. In the nature of the case, none who are not members can, because the order is secret. It is fair to give it the benefit of the doubt and to assume that it wants to stand for some things which everybody would approve, and that because of these things well-intentioned people here and there are drawn into it. But when the utmost recognition is given to these possible elements of credit, the order in its whole effect stands condemned because of one fact which nothing that its leaders may say, or may deny, can cover up. It poisons the relationship between the white people and the blacks. It puts suspicion and fear and hate into the midst of a situation which needs the utmost patience and confidence and good-will if ever it is to be worked out wisely. It tends to incite in the low-grade white the primeval lust of the pack that hunts, and to rouse in the black the cornered desperation of those who feel themselves to be the hunted—and hunted in the dark.

By what right may this be said?

1. In the first place, because of the name which this organization has chosen. Why did it choose that name rather than some other one? Why did it go back and revive an old name rather than select a new one? The only reasonable answer is that it wanted to revive the associations which that old name carried. And what was the old Ku Klux Klan? It was an organization that arose in the South after the Civil War—when the race problem was most terribly acute and the machinery of law and order was debauched by carpet-baggers and other alien political adventurers—to protect the integrity and re-assert the control of the white race. In those abnormal and desperate days, some such organization may have been a necessity. Even let that be granted. None the less, what does the re-appearance of an order adopting the name of the Ku Klux Klan imply? It implies that in the South, and in the country generally (since this order is trying to spread generally), the machinery of law and order is so little to be trusted, and the relations between the white and colored peoples are so envenomed, that the only way to keep the colored people on their good behavior, and the only way to prevent crime and overawe criminals, is to develop a secret, terrorizing agency to be the guardians of law and order—interpreted according to their idea. That is what the name Ku Klux Klan suggests to the average person who knows anything of its history, and especially that is what it suggests to the average negro. Nothing which the apologists for the order may vociferate about its alleged high principles can change this fact. They deliberately chose its name, and the name means something. It means an implication of social breakdown and of race hatred, and a covert recommendation of the lynch law spirit, which tend to inflame what is worst both among the whites and among the blacks.

2. The second fact upon which the condemnation of the Ku Klux Klan may be based is its insignia. It has adopted not only the name, but the dress which characterized the Klan in the reconstruction days, when it set out to terrorize the negro. In communities where the revamped organization has appeared, its members make it a point on special occasions to march through the streets and to appear on the platform at public meetings dressed in white robes with white masks over their faces. The more intelligent colored people are embittered. As for the ignorant ones, it is easy to imagine what effect the sight of these sheeted and masked figures has upon their mind. They see the veiled threat which these imply magnified into a danger which is the more ugly and appalling because it is formless, like some vague terror seen indistinctly in the dark. They have no means of knowing who is and who is not there behind those masks. It is easy for the more suspicious and fearful to believe that the leaders of the white community are there, and that the sentiment of all the white community is there represented. Immediately all the negroes tend to draw closer together, with the protective instinct of the pack. They distrust all the white people, since they cannot distinguish which among them are their enemies. Every movement for co-operation and good-will between the races, every effort to bring together the truest and most Christian leaders of both peoples to try to work out a wise and generous justice, is discouraged. The spirit is kindled which listens to every radical and incendiary utterance. When people think they are being hunted, all the primeval, furtive instincts of the jungle begin to rise again.

3. The third ground for condemnation of the Ku Klux Klan is in what its own leaders on occasions say. Last December the "grand wizard" of the order, one Colonel Simmons, of Atlanta, spoke in Richmond, where one of the editors of this paper, the present writer, heard him, together with a fellow-clergyman. There on the stage of the auditorium were a group of the Ku Klux Klan, sheeted and masked. After a fan-fare introduction, the "grand wizard" spoke. Most of what he said, and the response which by the tricks of a very clever manipulation of crowd psychology, he managed to get out of part of his audience, were enough to make anybody ashamed of human intelligence. He talked in spread-eagle fashion of the founders of the republic, and of the Ku Klux virtues of Washington, Madison, Jefferson and the rest, who, in his elegant phrase, "out-Ku-Kluxed the Ku-Kluxest Ku-Klux that ever was," and without ever directly saying so, he appeared to convey to the minds of the unthinking among his audience the idea that the builders of America in the beginning, and the leading figures in Washington today, were and are members of the Ku Klux Klan. All this was only more or less harmless clap-trap; but the sinister part of his speech was that which led to applause by some of his audience at the suggestion of the possible advantages of lynch law. He said that it had often been asserted that the Ku Klux Klan was going to commit violence against the negro, and string him up to the limb of a tree; but we do not propose to do that, he said—and then, with a pause and an inflection of which the audience immediately caught the meaning, and to which part of them responded with laughter and applause, he added, "Not necessarily!" Of course, he went on, if there should be times when some crime was committed, and the judge and the jury and the prosecuting attorney and the sheriff were not around to see that justice was done, and the Ku Klux were there, why then—another pause and a wave of the hand—why then, of course, we couldn't tell what might happen!

Now nobody could say that in that speech he directly and categorically advocated the lynch law idea. He was wise enough not to do that. But what he did do was an almost more dangerous thing. He suggested the idea, and he got a considerable part of his audience to applaud it; and it is this weakening of the morale and respect for law, and this tampering with the thought of irresponsible mob action, which is the ugly seed that the Ku Klux Klan is sowing.

4. The fourth ground for opposition to the Klan is the fact of the actual violence which is occurring in sections where the Klan is organized, and with at least the indirect responsibility for which the Klan has been charged. In Texas, particularly, and in other States in the past six months there have been forty-three cases in which persons were seized by masked mobs, in defiance of all law, and tarred and feathered. In at least one of these cases the Associated Press stated that the act was not only claimed, but boasted of by a local chapter of the Ku Klux Klan. Furthermore, no matter how much the Ku Klux Klan may disavow outrages like these, it cannot escape the consequences of its deliberate policy of masks and disguises. As the Houston (Tex.) Chronicle has said editorially to this Klan: "It matters not who can get into your organization, or who is kept out; any group of men can ape your disguises, your methods and your practices. If outrages occur for which you are not accountable—and they will—you have no way of clearing yourselves, except by throwing off your disguise and invoking the publicity you have sought to deny."

In these post-war days, we have already in the world too much of suspicion, hatred and half-smothered violence. In America, as the least distracted of the great nations, we must cultivate not only for ourselves, but for all humanity, the spirit of the reconcilers, if the world is to be redeemed. God forbid therefore that we should deliberately allow to grow up among ourselves an organization which in one of the most difficult and delicate of human adjustments tends to destroy the spirit of good-will, and substitute for it that expectation of racial evil which rouses evil up to answer!

It is good to know that the real leaders in many States have come out into the open as foes to this secret thing. Governors, United States Senators, Mayors, judges, as well as the spokesmen of the churches, have taken their stand against the Ku Klux Klan, as inimical to the social order. It ought to die, and there are signs that it will.

As to measures for the suppression or effective curtailment of the order, it is not well that too much should be attempted by law. If we err at all, let us err in America on the liberal side in regard to free speech and the peaceable expression of views, whether popular or unpopular. The one law in regard to the Ku Klux Klan, and any similar organizations, which would be obviously justified, would be a law prohibiting the appearance of men in masks or other disguises on the streets and in public places. The reason for such a law is indicated in what has been already said concerning the almost superstitious fear which such a hidden and furtive force rouses in the minds of those who suspect it; and the effect of such a regulation would be to limit the possibility of strut and melodrama which now makes the Ku Klux Klan appeal to a certain type of mind. For the rest, the surest corrective power will be a sane and wholesome public opinion, as this begins to be enlightened concerning the evil which of necessity follows from the Ku Klux Klan, in spite of its high-sounding protestations. When people stop joining it, and stop paying dues to support the organization and its organizers, the thing will dry up and die of itself.

THE WORLD'S UNREST AND ITS CURE

We are publishing in this issue the last of three sermons preached in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, by the Rev. Canon George William Douglas, D. D., on the Sunday mornings of August 21 and 28 and September 4. We would acknowledge the courtesy of Messrs. Parker and Bridge, 20 Broad Street, New York, and of Dr. Douglas himself, in sending us carefully revised copies of these sermons with permission to publish them.

Ever since the world war, with its disappointing and distressing aftermath, thoughtful readers have been surfeited with discussions of present conditions, of the dangers which still threaten our civilization and their remedy. These have ranged from the painfully flippant or trivial corruscations of newspaper penny-a-liners to weighty articles in the best reviews and volumes of many pages. It is wholly not the fault of these more serious writers that we are sometimes tempted to cry with Job, "Miserable comforters are ye all."

Some have widely missed, others have plainly intimated, both the sources of the world's sorrow and discontent and its single, painful corrective. The latter, among whom Dr. Douglas in these sermons is to be numbered, have not always had a patient hearing. The remedy to which they have pointed has seemed too partial, too unpractical, too slow and secret in its operation and, for men at large, too unwelcome, to receive a ready acceptance. So it has always been, and so the world is still unsaved. But this gospel of the cross, in the breadth of its meaning, the truth and power of Jesus Christ translated into human thought and life by His Spirit, has saved what has been saved of the world so far, and it is the only thing within sight of God or man that can save it. Let us believe that, we who say we believe in God; and taking this principle of self-sacrice and consecration to God's will into our own lives, and hence into the life of the Church, the community, the nation and the world, prove that our Lord and Saviour is what He claims to be.

We commend these sermons to the thoughtful consideration of our readers.

Book Notices

The Story of St. Paul's Life and Letters by J. Paterson Smyth. James Pott & Co., New York. $1.50.

This is a religious book about the Bible for both the clergy and the laity.

It is written in Dr. Smyth's vivid and fascinating style, and yet one knows that it holds the knowledge of a thorough scholar.

The author says at the outset that "it is almost impossible to overstate what Paul meant to Christianity," and as we follow him from place to place through the pages of this absorbingly interesting book, as we listen to him in the scattered Jewish synagogues, and share his struggles and persecutions, his disappointments and times of depression, the inevitable conclusion is that this is no exaggeration.

This book so carries you into the very life of the great apostle to the Gentiles that you feel that his friends are your friends, and that his struggles and opposition is something you must help him to meet and overcome.

One can almost hear the impassioned appeal on Mars' Hill in the Athenian sunshine.

At Corinth it is easy to think that you, too, are a guest in the simple home of Acquilla, and are helping to make tents by day and argue religion by night.

At Jerusalem that feeling of lack of sympathy disappoints you because it disappointed Paul, and the scenes before the high priest and the Roman officials are real places with live people speaking and moving so vividly are they described.

When we come to Rome we enjoy a new sense of the greatness of the imperial city, and it is there, too, that we see the way that Paul's friends loved him and sought him out on their visits to the metropolis, and so gave him the opportunity of sending back to their home towns, those letters that have become such an important part of our New Testament. We meet here Epaphroditus from Philippi, and we see Paul seizing the opportunity of his visit to send back a letter to the church in that town, where he had been so cruelly scourged. Here, too, we meet Onesimus, the young runaway slave who escaped from his master, Philemon, and whom Paul sent back to his master with a little letter which has become one of the books of our Bible, and so we get a fascinatingly interesting glimpse of the Bible in the making.

We close this review with two quotations, because in different ways they show the style of the writer and give our readers a little taste of the feast that awaits one who secures and reads this book.

On page seven, after recounting many intimate little details in Paul's life, Dr. Smyth says: "I have been thinking chiefly here of the human side of the human interest in the Bible, for the ignoring of it by religious people has tended much to make Bible reading uninteresting and unreal. Is it necessary here to remind any reader that the more he habituates himself to read his Bible naturally and sympathetically, recognizing fully the human side of it, the more necessary it is to remember with reverence and awe that God is, in the truest sense, its author; the more he enjoys the personality of the writers, the more needful to keep in mind that the writings 'came not by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost' "

Again, we quote another passage to show the modernness of the writer's viewpoint. On page 77 he writes:

"We are now in the theatre of the late great war. The men who have fought around Gallipoli, the allied troops encamped at Salonika, to which afterwards came the epistles to Thessalonians, should be interested in this part of the story of St. Paul. They stood where Paul stood 1,900 years earlier. They, too, were standing there for the helping of the world for the honor of Christ."

"Now comes a point in the story of vital interest to ourselves. One evening Paul stood at sunset on the confines of Asia at Troy looking out at the dim mountains of Europe across the sea, and when darkness came in the visions of the night he learned the meaning of that impulse that was urging him westward. The meaning was Europe. In Europe was to be planted the banner of the cross. A vision appeared to Paul in the night—a man of Macedonia beseeching him and saying, "Come over and help us." And straightway we concluded that God had called us to preach the good news unto them. Straightway we sought to go forth. In the morning around the shipping in the harbor were the newly arrived travelers seeking a passage. Setting sail from Troas, we made a straight course to Samothrace, and next day to Neapolis, and from thence to Philippi.

Thus came the gospel to Europe."

Those readers who enjoyed Dr. Smyth's "People's Life of Christ" will find as much pleasure in this shorter but equally attractively and instructively written volume.

It is rather a pity that it is not indexed, but the table of contents is so complete that it is easy to find quickly anything that one is looking for.

Buff—A Collie. By Albert Payson Terhune. George H. Doran Company, New York. $2.

Any lover of the beautiful cannot but admire Buff and be grateful to him for helping to gladden a sore miserable man, unjustly charged with theft—imprisoned and released to face a cold, cynical world.

The fidelity and faithfulness of a dog surpasses often the friendship of fellow beings, and their love and loyalty is an example which it would not hurt us to follow and is well portrayed in this book.

The story holds one's interest from start to finish, and is so simply told that children as well as adults will find the book enjoyable.

The raising and breeding of dogs is interestingly told, and the characteristics of a collie and bulldog are impressively brought out—to be able to follow for miles the scent of his master—the sub-conscious fighting skill, the heroic instinct to protect the weak child or beloved master; also the generalship of a collie—herding and driving sheep which would keep three men busily running and shouting to do. The story of Michael Trent, hounded by villians, and his experiences is well worth the reading, and it will make us all want "Buff" in our homes.

Brass is no Sunday school story, but for all that it is written with a definite object, for the good of the race, especially of the people of the United States.

It is, as it purports to be, a novel of marriage—marriage, remarriage, and marriage again.

As one follows the hero, if such the leading character may be called through his varied matrimonial career, and sees the way that he deteriorates in character, and in his standards, and the way that the possibility of easy divorce is ever in the near background of every marriage in one of our Western cities, one is impressed with the enormity of this evil to-day.

The book goes into the details of the intimacies of married life with a minuteness of detail that is sordid, and sometimes altogether disgusting, but with it all it carries a vivid impression of the completeness with which two lives become intermingled in the marriage state.

It is almost devoid of really admirable characters, but is well written and holds the attention of the reader throughout its 452 closely written pages of small type, and it constitutes a powerful argument for both State and Church taking positive action against allowing the remarriage of divorced couples and in favor of uniform legislation on the subject throughout the country.

Helen of the Old House. By Harold Bell Wright. D. Appleton & Co. $1.50.

This is a story with a purpose. There is rather too much purpose and not enough story, but the book is clean and wholesome, and has a freedom from suggestive scenes and conversation that is as refreshing as is it unusual in modern novels. It deals with industrial relations of today, its object being to show the need of the assertion of the true American spirit of independent democracy on the part of the workers, and of fair dealing by the employers. The great defect of the book is its long and rather tiresome discourses on economic conditions, which become wearisome in their frequency, but we admire the object of the writer in his desire to bring about better industrial relations.

JESUS CHRIST, THE SAME YESTERDAY, TODAY AND FOREVER

JESUS CHRIST AND HIS VISION

The Rev. George William Douglas, D. D.

His Name shall be called Wonderful.—Isa. 9:6.

Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and today, and forever.—Heb. 13:8.

This is life eternal, that they should know Thee the only true God, and Him Whom Thou didst send, Jesus Christ. . . . I manifested Thy Name unto the men whom Thou gavest Me out of the world. . . . And for their sakes I consecrate Myself, that they themselves also may be consecrated in truth: . . . that they may be one, even as we are one: I in them, and Thou in Me. . . . I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am, that they may behold My glory.—John 17:3, 6, 19. 22, 23, 24.

We have considered human life as being, to serious persons like Ezekiel and Daniel, a constant cause of wonder. Hitherto, however, the most marvelous Object of all, though we referred to Him necessarily and often, was mentioned incidentally. Today, as is right and proper, I shall make Him my main theme: Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, today, forever.

It is the fashion to speak disparagingly of modern Christendom. For example, in his recent book, "Our Social Heritage," Professor Graham Wallas says that when, on Armistice Day in England, he heard some children singing "God Save the King," a conviction swept through him that "the task of our generation is so to work and think as to be able "to hand on to the boys and girls, who at the next important turning point in history may gather in the schools the heritage of a world outlook deeper and wider than that of modern Christendom." So say we all. But mark you, though Professor Wallas speaks ill of modern Christendom, from cover to cover there is not a word in disparagement of Christ Himself. And it is of Jesus Christ Himself, as by common consent the Wonder of human life, that I propose to speak. Wonderful in His own transcendent Person, and wonderful in His forecast of the life to come, as He saw it in a vision, when in the upper chamber at Jerusalem He offered His farewell prayer for His disciples and Himself. Now, as two thousand years ago, "What think ye of Christ?" is the fundamental question of the hour.

Brethren, I am not a pessimist. No minister of the gospel has a right to preach pessimism. But, now if ever, what firm ground is there for optimism apart from Christ? and woe be to us, if we, who call ourselves Christians, misrepresent Him. Indeed, it is no small part of the Wonder of Christ, that when His ostensible disciples do misrepresent Him, His hold on men remains; and that, too, although His message is so uncompromising and in some respects so hard. For one of the things that must not be softened down, and in our epoch least of all, is the austerity of genuine Christianity. As Bishop Gore remarks in his new book on "Christian Moral Principles," "The greatest mistake the Church has ever made—and it has pervaded its history—is that of concealing from the young, or from men in general, that Christianity is not an easy thing." That is what those of our sailors and soldiers who for the first time in their lives found real religion at the war front, have tried to impress on us ministers of Christ since they came home. "Don't prophesy smooth things. Only a summons to do and think hard things will appeal to us men and women who went through those heart-searching years." Accordingly, in concluding, I shall try to present, as an essential part of His Wonderfulness, the exceeding difficulty of the demand which Christ makes on all who desire to be His faithful disciples. Given this world as we know it, and ourselves as we are, who would have supposed that Christ's plan for us would be such as He discloses? This is the point to which I confine myself—not the general Wonder of Christ's life as a whole, but the particular Wonder of the demand He makes on us, and His vision of its results for Him and us together. There are thousands nowadays who honestly desire to follow Him; and the most serious adversary in their way is not the overt atheist, but those of us who, though we ought to know better and be better, present Christ to truth-seekers incorrectly and half-heartedly when it comes to the real pinch. Every man and woman who ever did a great, progressive deed towards the upbuilding of the world has had visions, which were painfully translated into constructive action. Let us see what Christ's vision was, for that may enable us to appreciate better His constructive action in the past two thousand years, and in the catastrophes of this present time. Let us pray all together, brothers: Lord, open our eyes, that we may see and know the very Christ of the gospel. His Wonderfulness begins when, going contrary to the world, Christ makes His peculiar demand on His disciples who are in the world; and the Wonder culminates in His prophetic Vision of the result, of the ultimate beatitude of Himself and them when He and they together shall have gone through the straight gate and the narrow way that leadeth unto life. Yet in all this there is another Wonder still: that not even the probability that we shall be thereby repelled moves Christ to hesitate to forewarn us that "there be few that find" that narrow way.

> And the little more, and what worlds away!

Perhaps I shall best lead up to the heart of my subject by first calling your attention to a symptom of the present condition of mankind: how large a proportion of us are spiritually, mentally and physically trying to get away from present conditions of our life. This is the autumn season, when in the countryside we shall soon be watching the migratory birds. But look around you on this human earth, brethren, and look into your own mind and spirit. Are not the majority of us, in heart and mind, migratory too? It seems as if any manner of life other than our own; any situation but that in which we are; any system of moral compulsion and of religious observance except what we are accustomed to, would be preferable in our eyes. You have heard many attributing this chronic discontent to the war. But it is more and more evident that the war, as a school for higher education, has been over-rated. So now and then a person, who sees a little deeper, diagnoses our condition as but another of those occasional, inscrutable waves of emotion such as caused the invasion of Europe by barbarians, or later the crusades, or again the rush of emigrants from Europe to America—all which impulsive waves, they say, are a counterpart, on a big scale, of the mysterious motive that drives an individual traveler to the wilds of Africa or to Arctic snows. And some of our psycho-analysists pretend that at bottom we have here the same emotion to which Tom Hood gave classic expression in his poem, "The Bridge of Sighs," where the poor girl suicide rashly determines to go—that is, out of this world into any other. In fact, the psycho-analysists declare that they find the same disposition in people who are actuated by no such tragic cause. Whether it be comfort or discomfort, an overdose of either seems to produce the same malaise. This manifestation must not be confounded with the spirit of the true pioneer. Abraham had that, and the New Testament holds it up in him as a virtue, not a vice. But as to what we are speaking of, both the aim and the results are earthly and vicious. We are speaking, not of the chosen remnant, but of the rank and file of mankind, as they "move to and fro and increase knowledge," and for them it is plain enough that although their migrations may have produced more or less of material and intellectual betterment under the sun, the ultimate benefit of this physical mobility and mental agility is for millions problematical. For in its moral depths average human nature is so static that no more surface improvement of social, political and economic conditions avails to liberate mankind from their perennial ennui—their dissatisfaction of soul. Nay, the very latest material developments of natural science have stung ennui into positive despair; since the engines of science are now being utilized for the diabolic destruction of what human culture had achieved; while the world-old envy and class-feeling between the haves and the have-nots, whether under autocracy or democracy, is more and more generally diffused.

Now that, on a great scale, is an exhibition of the same general disposition of mind and soul which, on a small scale, is exhibited in single individuals. And I have dwelt on it as it appears in the large, because thereby the Wonder of Jesus Christ is the more striking and significant.

Over against that whole vast mass of average human character Christ sets Himself. He Himself is the exact opposite, and He demands the opposite of us. Nobody can be a follower of Christ if he persists in cherishing that self-centered, and therefore discontented, habit of mind and soul. From earliest childhood on, Christ's temper was that of the Son, consciously and gladly "about His Father's business"; and for ordinary mankind Christ translated that into the temper of the Roman centurion: "I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me"; that is to say, I have a will of my own; but I am always exerting it, not in self-seeking, but to fulfil my superior officer's will. And of that centurion Christ said to His chosen disciples, "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel."

It was, then, for such rare souls that our Lord prayed specially on Good Friday Eve; and of such, in the upper chamber at Jerusalem, He had the vision recorded by St. John. "I make request for them; not for the world, but for those whom Thou hast given me out of the world . . . that they may be one as we are: I in them, and Thou in Me. . . . I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am, that they may behold My glory."

But the Wonder of Christ's vision for Himself and His disciples by and by is dependent on another Wonder, which is immediate—enacted that very night in Gethsemane, whither He conducts them. If any of those elect disciples is to have fulfilled in himself what Christ foresaw in the vision of the upper chamber, that disciple, according to his ability and place, must have Gethsemane also fulfilled in himself as an antecedent experience. What ails us worldlings is that we shirk our Gethsemanes; and that, I suppose, is what two of the early Christian fathers, two hundred years apart, meant when, each for himself, they wrote it down that "a Christian is made, not born." Christ must be in you as your hope of glory; and what puts Him in you, so that He becomes part and parcel of you, is a decisive act of your own will. So a Christian is made, not born. No man becomes such by mere inheritance; and when it really happens, to the world at large it is so strange and surprising that, no matter what else men think of it, they are commonly agreed in the world at large that at least the Name whereby Christ shall be called is Wonderful.

Brethren, who cannot see that even Social Service—which, after a fashion, is now getting to be popular—may be cankered by pride? As things are usually, even upon men's idealism the imprint of self-will is so impressed that, though they call themselves Christians, they are not. The whole human ideal—health and happiness, philanthropy, the charm of social intercourse, the zest of political and commercial activity and education—down at their very springs and source Christ will inject His Spirit. They must be signed with the sign of the cross; for Christianity is not the same as civilization—so far from it that, as we are seeking now all over the world, unless civilization will bend to the rule and purpose of Christ, it is headed for ruin: it is one more "vanity of vanities," bound to perish in the using: which is evidently one reason why, from cover to cover, the Bible speaks almost as contemptuously of ordinary civilizations, one after another, as it does of ordinary majorities. What Christ wants now of our civilization is that it, and the industry of which it is the fruit, be spiritualized. And there lies, for the world, the wonder of true Christianity. It astonishes and disconcerts the world by sheer independence of the world.

But the trouble is that even those who know and admire Christ as an historic Figure have allowed Him to fade away from their practical religion. Hence, as they "run to and fro, and knowledge is increased," they are bewildered. In such bewilderment the surest way to go on from knowledge to understanding is to make, with Christ, an immediate act of will. It is by an act of will that we rise out of the wonders of this temporary scene into the wonders of the eternal life. Pause, and concentrate your attention on what you know of Jesus Christ. Say to yourself, "I will make it my daily rule to act as that good man Christ would have me act. I will follow out the practical maxims that He put on record to express His life. They shall be, not merely a theory of the better life, but my guide to life, and one step enough for me." Some people talk of the will of society—the social will—and, in the popular phrase, they "put their ears to the ground." Others talk of the will of the universe, and that we must have a "cosmic mind," and into that vagueness they let their wills evaporate. But Christ is not vague. First, for cosmos He substitutes God the Father. Then He says, "Whoso hath seen Me hath seen the Father. Follow Me."

Brethren, we are about to celebrate Labor Day, when every Christian will hope and pray that hard workers of every kind—rich or poor, with brain or brawn—may improve their condition and enjoy the privileges of self-respecting, free men. Notice, therefore, that I have not said a world today against worldly success and getting on in the world; for, taking His whole life and words together, I do not find that Christ our Lord did so. He understood too well the world's wonderfulness to condemn it utterly. God, Who sent man out to subdue and possess the earth, cannot be displeased when by honest industry men get on, and show forth what excellent things can be done with worldly wealth when men so choose. Hence, in spite of Christ's warning that it is very hard for the world's successful men to be His true disciples, nevertheless He Himself declares that they can do it. But even so—nay, all the more so—Christ makes plain that it is hard for all, rich or poor: that there is no escaping that Gethsemane where each must individually consent that his will be crucified; so that our Prayer Book collects are exactly right: "O God, Who alone canst order the unruly wills and affections of sinful men, grant unto Thy people that they may love the thing which Thou commandest. Stir up, we beseech Thee, the wills of Thy faithful people." The world of nature is governed throughout by natural laws; the worldly success, like worldly failure, follows upon our obedience, or disobedience, to the natural laws. At every turn of the road some immutable law awaits us with its consequences. But whether it be by the way of success or failure, sooner or later this world passeth away, while we human souls pass on; and Christ's selected few, whether successful or unsuccessful to worldly eyes, stand out from the rest to God's eyes because, like Christ their Master, they "consecrate themselves" to obey, not alone the natural laws, but the supernatural law whereby "God is all in all." "I in them," prayed Christ, "and Thou in Me, that we all may be made perfect in one. Father, I will that those Thou hast given Me out of the world be with Me where I am, that they may see My glory, and have My joy fulfilled in themselves"—that is, the glory and the joy of fulfilling the perfect Father's will. So Christ renders God at once intelligible to man and within the reach of man's consenting will.

Religious men today stand towards God pretty much where men generally stood towards this earth before the sources of physical energy were developed—heat, light, steam, electricity and such like. The Christian Church has hardly touched as yet the stores of spiritual energy which God has ready if only we will employ them in unison with Christ our Lord; His will and ours combined. Persons who apprehend God without Christ fix their attention on outward circumstances; and they are apt to attempt to draw down God's power and keep it in their own hands for their own short-sighted use; whereas these who accept God in Christ make it their aim to give back into God's hands whatever power they have. Lately, for the brief moment of the world war, there were many to whom, through their own self-sacrifice, Christ became very real and near. But now, even to some such, Christ is becoming dim again. And in their sad case

"This is the wonder of wonders, that it hardly quickens one's breath
To think that Christ is real—and Death!"

Does some one urge, "You are too vague. Don't leave me in the clouds. Come down from the Mount of Vision and tell me what to do here today"? My brother, it belongs to the wonderfulness of the true Christian life that, even if there were time, I could not go much further with you, or come much closer down. None can do for another what you want. Each by himself must enter into his closet, and shut the door. Except this: that when you go into your Gethsemane, and come out again, you have with you all along Christ's written, explicit, simple rule of life: the Sermon on the Mount, followed up by the Sermon on the Plain. For two thousand years the wonder of their direct helpfulness to such as you and I are has been incontestable. This is one of the ways whereby "Jesus Christ is the same, yesterday, and today, and forever."

There is comfort in the thought that even if we are not now what we ought to be, there is no necessity for staying where we are. God is ever calling us and aiding us in our faintest efforts to obey that call.—Bishop A. P. Forbes.

Philosophy, in the night of Paganism, was like the firefly of the tropics, making itself visible, but not irradiating the darkness. But Christianity, revealing the Sun of Righteousness sheds more than the full sunlight of those tropics on all that we need to see, whether for time or eternity.—Coleridge.

OUR NEED OF CHRISTIAN FRIENDLINESS

Part of a Sermon Preached on the Sunday Before Labor Day by Rt. Rev. Edwin S. Lines, D. D.

We need more friendliness and neighborly feeling in community life. There are no neighbors any more in our great towns. We are all too busy to give attention to the gentle and kindly side of life. We are ready to give relief, but not to give ourselves to make a more friendly world.

We let hardness come into business and indifference into social life. We go to the homes of our friends to attend their funerals, not to see them living. We put everything in life on a hard business basis and look out for ourselves. And the message out of the Word of God for Labor Day and all days is, "Sirs, ye are brethren; why do ye wrong one to another?"

It must be acknowledged that the Church has not given the proper leadership in this great movement for the betterment of those who do the world's hard work. The penalty has been paid for such lack of foresight and interest in men and women in hard places in life, and this generation has seen the Church on both sides of the Atlantic awake to its duty and its privilege of proclaiming that industry must be ordered according to the just and merciful principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

Those of us who are set to preach the gospel are not called upon to tell men how to conduct their business, but many of us are not as ignorant of practical life as some great business men think. We do know also how men and women who are doing the world's hard work feel and think, and for them we are bound to speak. The reproach of the Church for not being interested in the conditions under which the great majority live and work is being lifted.

We are committed to the democratic order in State and Church alike. Many of our people are disposed to make class distinctions in other ways than are accepted abroad, and it is worthy only of ridicule. It is the glory of our country that there is a better chance for people to come on to usefulness and comfort and to make for themselves a place in the world here than anywhere else. Lord Haldane said that not one in a thousand of boys in England could hope to enter one of the great universities, and in our own country there is not a boy of intelligence, character and diligence who may not make his choice among our universities and be gladly welcomed. Let men who work with their hands not draw off into a class, nor think of themselves as making a separate class in any way, but let them take their places in all the movements which make for the common good of the country and the community.

The rule of fairness and justice, of kindness and good will, must come into the ordering of industry, and there is no hope without it of getting out of contention and unemployment and disorder. The men who employ other men, the managers of corporations, must have an interest in those who work with them and for them. If it cannot have the personal character which it once had, it can be at least real and genuine.

The man who has come into the ownership or direction of a business and gathered about himself a group of men and women must feel a sense of responsibility for them and a desire to make of them a company of self-respecting, comfortably housed, well fed people with a good chance in life. He deserves not respect if he exploits them for his own self-advantage, that he make a fortune, build a great house, have a better automobile than his neighbors, belongs to clubs and an exclusive set which counts the world as belonging to them. He must stop thinking of labor as a commodity, or that he is to get all he can out of other people for himself. He must not make for himself a great house in the most attractive part of the town and forget the miserable houses and streets in which his people live. He must be patient, high minded, remembering what lies back of the feeling of resentment of those who are in hard places in life.

On the other hand, the wage-earners must accept the rule of fairness and justice, and for a fair day's pay do a fair day's work. Organized labor has its responsibility in never becoming the tool of selfish politicians, in never accepting the leadership of dishonest and self-seeking men, in maintaining a sense of duty to the whole country and community and a high ideal of citizenship. Organized labor, even as the Church or any other institution to prosper must command the respect, confidence and good will of the great company of fair-minded people. It must respect public opinion, as we all have to do. We all must cease to judge and act in the great questions and movements of life, with our own set, our own party, our own interests, our own Church in mind, while we try to look at things from the other man's standpoint also, and are fair and friendly in all that we do.

"No right-minded man can stand for the existing industrial order, nor for the conduct of organized labor, without qualification. The Church is in the world and is the only organization in the world having for its supreme end the maintenance of morals, manners and religion, and they all stand together or fall together. So the message of the Church must be to all men, whatever their position, of the unchanging and eternal principles of good religion in the ordering of every part of human life.

"It is a time of turmoil and unsettlement, of anxiety and fear as to what may be coming on the earth. A new world is in the making, and they who are trying to bring back the old order and set the world going again as it was are sure to be disappointed. The message in the midst of all the conflict and confusion is, 'Sirs, ye are brethren; why do you wrong one to another?' Why should not men and women, whatever their calling and place in life may be, with courage and great hope set themselves to the making of a world in which dwelleth righteousness?"

THE HOME FOR BOYS AT COVINGTON, VA.: A CORRECTION.

Mr. Editor: An unfortunate impression has been created relative to the Home for Boys at Covington. I beg to be allowed to correct this in the next issue of your paper.

Owing to the failure of the Nation-Wide Campaign to yield a full response to its appeal for funds, the Presiding Bishop and Council has been unable to meet the demands of many institutions whose askings had been approved. Among these is the Home at Covington.

A number of subscribers to the Nation-Wide fund, who were particularly interested in the Home, in order that the Home might be saved and the children fed, designated sums aggregating a little more than $25,000 as a relief fund. It was this $25,000 alone that the Home has as yet received in any sense from the Nation-Wide funds.

Later the Presiding Bishop and Council, with a view to bringing the above action of the subscribers into harmony with the policy of the Presiding Bishop and Council, and also with a view to having these donations properly credited to their diocesan quotas, formally appropriated to the Home this same twenty-five thousand dollars. This resulted in the impression that a second $25,000 had been received by the Home. As a matter of fact, this represented simply the $25,000 specially designated by interested subscribers and already alluded to.

At the recent meeting of the Presiding Bishop and Council in the city of Washington, in response to an appeal of a joint committee from the dioceses of Southern Virginia and Southwestern Virginia, a second $25,000 was appropriated upon certain conditions. Thus the impression appears to prevail that the $25,000 designated by subscribers and the $25,000 appropriated by the Presiding Bishop and Council (which action was in reality merely a matter of bookkeeping), and the $25,000 conditionally appropriated by the Presiding Bishop and Council constitute a total of seventy-five thousand dollars which the Home has received.

The object of this letter is definitely to contradict this erroneous impression.

As a matter of fact, the Home has received only the one sum of $25,000, this being the sum designated by the subscribers and later appropriated by the Presiding Bishop and Council, but expended by the Home prior to the action of the Presiding Bishop and Council.

The point I wish to make clear is this: that no part of the $25,000 conditionally appropriated by the Presiding Bishop and Council at its meeting in Washington has as yet been paid. This, however, has been due to the fact that the Executive Board of one of the dioceses concerned has not met since this action was taken. Hence the "conditions" have not been complied with.

In the meantime the Home is suffering. I wish to bespeak for the Home the good will of our people and to express the hope that it may receive their generous support.

THE "KU KLUX KLAN."

Mr. Editor: The recent revival throughout the country of "night riders," many of whom wore the garb of the famed "K. K. K." or "Invisible Government" of Reconstruction times, must needs give rise to serious thought on the part of the truly loyal and patriotic people of the United States.

There was a time in the history of our Southland when an ignorant, gullible and easily led race of aliens, to whom popular government had never been known in their African jungles, was being manipulated by vicious and unscrupulous persons of the Caucasian race for their devilish purposes. The ideals of Anglo-Saxon civilization were ruthlessly trodden under foot, and those who for centuries had been accustomed to be ruled by "due process of law" were at the mercy of foul harpies who flocked from the four corners of heaven to batten on the rich pickings presented by an overturned civilization. Then it seemed to some, by no means all 100 per cent. Americans, that the only way to circumvent that destruction which was fast engulfing their loved homeland, was by playing upon the notorious credulity of the ignorant black and the cowardly fear of the vicious white man, they could prevent their wreaking upon defenseless ones their diabolical intentions —then was born the real "Ku Klux Klan."

But are we threatened by any such condition today? Shall we, after nearly fifty years of "white supremacy," thirty of which years the rule of the white man has been absolutely unquestioned, shall we now openly and before the world make confession that we are unfit for the regular and constituted processes of government? A thousand times, no! Shall we who pride ourselves on our ability to rule in an orderly manner, and therefore deny to our colonial possessions in Porto Rico, the Philippines and Virgin Islands, the right to govern themselves as they were wont; shall we, while forcing upon them our theories of government, surreptitiously invoke their own methods of fear in government and have an "Invisible Government" on the style of a Villa or Aguinaldo, thus putting into the discard that ordered and orderly system of government which has been the glory of the Anglo-Saxon race?

The evidence of lawlessness, incipient it may be, but none the less alive, is before us, and every "K. K. K." is a sign-post along the way we are traveling. Sooner or later this lawlessness will have to be dealt with or there will be a welter of blood and a riot of rapine, fire and murder.

To repeat, there is no excuse for the existence of an organization with ironclad oaths binding its members to secrecy, whose purpose is to make and administer laws unlawfully, other than the open and acknowledged failure of the courts and the courthouse and local officials to do their duty with impartiality and fear of none save God alone. If that is the case, there should be a thorough house-cleaning and the electorate see to it that only good men and true are chosen to make, interpret and administer the laws of our country.

A COMMENT ON DR. MANN'S WARNING TO THE CLERGY.

Mr. Editor: In the Churchman of September 10 a warning by Dr. Mann appears concerning a swindler who cleverly tries to get money from the clergy by a long-distance telephone trick, or some other ingenious device.

This man is probably one Walter H. Hale, who was liberated from the New Castle County workhouse in June after serving a two years' sentence for robbing me in the same way. I gave wide publicity to the story of my own case at the time of its occurrence, and as a result the man was arrested a few days later in Massachusetts and there imprisoned for six months as punishment for swindling the rector of the church in Pittsfield by the same trick.

Walter H. Hale is apparently an incurable crook. When we had him extradited from Massachusetts to Delaware after the prison term there was completed, he was put on trial for "larceny by trick," and sentenced to two years in the workhouse. As a prisoner he behaved extremely well. I myself kept in touch with him and did him a number of kindnesses. He wrote me frequent letters and professed himself to be a changed man and anxious to live straight when he was liberated.

A brother offered him a home and employment, but apparently he never went near his brother, but started again at once upon his career of fraud.

Within one month he was heard of from Detroit, where he had impersonated Warden Plummer, of the Newcastle County workhouse—posed as a prison reformer—called at the Detroit penitentiary and was shown through the building, criticized certain of their methods, and cited the Delaware institution as a model of what should be done. Incidentally he tried to get the Michigan warden to cash a $300 check for him, but he did not succeed. During his stay in Detroit he put up at the Hotel Statler, registered as Warden Plummer, of Delaware, and left owing a very considerable score. He was later tracked to Philadelphia and detained for examination, but, unfortunately, was not then subject to any charge under which he could be indicted in the State of Pennsylvania, and was consequently liberated.

The man is at large, and was heard of on Saturday last as trying to extract money from a clergyman in Reading, Pa., by his old trick. The clergy especially should be on their guard. "Hale" is an alias, and he has evidently adopted a new one. He is approximately thirty years of age, tall, of fair complexion, looks consumptive, impresses one as an educated man, and seems to have an unending fund of information concerning the clergy of our Church.

My advice to any clergyman who may be approached by him is that he secure his arrest if possible, and conviction under a charge of "larceny by trick." He is a menace to the community and unfit to be at large. For his own sake, as well as that of other people, he should be returned to prison as soon as possible.

THE PRAYER FOR THE DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor: I am using the prayer authorized by Bishop Harding, given on page thirteen of the Southern Churchman of September 10, for the Peace Conference, and especially for disarmament; but I leave out the word "righteous," where the petition is for all righteous governments. I suppose the prayer excludes such governments as are Prussian in character; but they are the very ones that need our prayers most. I am reminded of General Ewell's reply to the ministers of Carlisle, Pa., when asked if he would object to their using the prayer for the President of the United States. "Certainly not," said the general; "I know of no one who needs your prayers more. I wish to attend church myself."

LET ME NOT FORGET.

When I forget Thee, like a sun-parched land,
Which neither rain nor dew from heaven hath wet,
So my soul withers, and I understand
Wherefore Thou gavest me this high command
Not to forget.

When I forget the death which is my life,
How weak I am! how full of fear and fret!
How my heart wavers in a constant strife
With mists and clouds that gather round me rife,
When I forget!

Ah, how can I forget? And yet my heart
By dull oblivious thought is hard beset,
Bred in the street, the meadow, or the mart:
Yet Thou my strength and life and glory art,
Though I forget.

I will remember all Thy love divine;
Oh, meet Thou with me where Thy saints are met,
Revive me with the holy bread and wine,
And may my love, O God, lay hold on Thine,
And ne'er forget.

And not today alone, but evermore,
Oh, let me feel the burden of the debt—
The load of sorrow that the Master bore,
The load of goodness that He keeps in store,
And not forget.

The Great Commission.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

American Church Mission, Nanking, July 28, 1921.

Since our last letter not a great deal has happened which is of unusual significance. Just the plain every-day life of a mission station with its routine work, all of which, however, is shot through with the desire and aim of strengthening and building up our Christians, and interpreting the spirit of our religion to those outsiders with whom we can get in contact.

Of course we had a great farewell reception for our Chinese priest, Mr. Chung, when he left for his new charge in Shanghai. As a rule these farewells are called "Hwan Sung Hweis," meaning a Joyful Farewell Meeting, but our people decided that the usual name did not express the spirit of the occasion, so they called it a "Chu En Hwei," meaning a Meeting for the Departing Benefactor. There were several hundred people present, and the usual speeches of appreciation and good wishes, but when Mr. Chung gave his parting exhortation to his people at least two-thirds of the audience sat with tears running down their face, a thing I have never before seen in China, and a remarkable tribute to the worth of Mr. Chung and the place he had won in their affections.

For some weeks after Mr. Chung's departure things were very discouraging. In the inevitable readjustment of the work and in the duties of the Chinese helpers, jealousies cropped up and discord arose, and it looked as if we had a very serious time ahead. Then we had news of the coming of Mr. J. M. Hickson, the English healer, who was to give us a two days' mission. In the week of prayer in preparation for this mission there was a noticeable spiritual awakening among the Christians, and especially among the workers who were at odds one with another. The wonderful manifestation of God's power seen in the healing service greatly moved our workers; they laid aside their personal jealousies and grievances and have worked in harmony and with renewed zeal ever since. This healing mission was a great success from every point of view. The many remarkable cures effected made one feel as if he were living in the early days of the Church—blind received their sight, the deaf their hearing, the dumb spake and the sick were made whole again. There was absolutely no emotional excitement, but rather a quiet realization of Christ's presence and power in our midst. And the spiritual blessings received far surpassed the physical. As a result more than ten heathen who were healed have become enquirers and are to be admitted catechumens next month. The other missions in the city which united with us in these services were equally blessed.

On Trinity Sunday I had the privilege of baptizing twenty-nine men and boys, and on June 26 Bishop Graves confirmed a class of thirty-one, men and women and students from our boys' and girls' schools. One of this class was an old gentleman over seventy who for many years had belonged to one of the strictest of the Buddhist sects, but is now a most zealous Christian.

Our schools closed on July 9, and we graduated our first class from the Girls' School, three students, one of whom enters the Bible Woman's Training School at Soochow in the fall. There were five members of the graduating class in the Boys' School. Of these eight graduates six are communicants of the church. That week I invited the two schools and their friends to take a trip to New York via the reflectoscope route, and it was most amusing to see and hear their amazement at the tall buildings and great bridges of that wonderful city. This reflectoscope I brought back with me from my furlough, and it is going to be a great asset to our work.

The next week we had a social for our Sunday schools, held on my lawn, and allowed each pupil to bring a small friend. Manners were not to the fore when the refreshments were served, and it was comical to behold the dismay of some street gamin when in the attempt to make the largest possible haul from a plate piled with candy he discovered that he was knocking more off on the ground than he was getting into his hands; one possible way of teaching the futility of greediness. We hope some of these little guests will later enter our Sunday school and maybe learn better ways.

We are pushing negotiations for the purchase of the Chinese building mentioned in my last letter, and hope to complete the deal in a few weeks, a very expeditious business deal as such things go in China. And what a Godsend it will be to our work. As things work out one sees God's leading through them all. Just as this purchase began to be settled our landlord of the building where we have a street preaching hall, reading room, offices and workers' residence, gave us three months' notice to vacate. If this purchase were not possible we would be forced to close all that part of our work because no other place could be rented for that purpose.

Politically, poor China seems to be going from bad to worse. This summer many of the provinces are in the throes of civil war, with the prospect of two or three more being added to the number very soon. All due to militarist leaders striving among themselves for power and pelf, or to wreak their hate upon some rival, and the poor people have to eat the bitterness. One can see no end to it all.

However, we have every cause to be hopeful for the future of our work, provided the workers are faithful and the support is forthcoming for the work that has to be done. Pray for us all that we may be enabled to enter into all the doors of opportunity which are opened to us.

MARKING OF ARCHDEACON STUCK'S GRAVE.

No doubt many people have been thinking during the past months of the lonely grave at Fort Yukon, where the body of Archdeacon Stuck was laid to rest last October. Every one will desire that this resting-place of a hero of the Church should be worthily marked. Knowing Archdeacon Stuck's convictions about such matters, it has seemed best not to send to Fort Yukon any monument in a conventional form. It was therefore decided that the Archdeacon's grave should be marked by a Celtic cross made of concrete.

The design for the wooden mould was accordingly forwarded to Dr. Burke at Fort Yukon. Sufficient cement was already on hand. The white men and Indians gladly agreed to give their labor. A bronze tablet has been designed and forwarded to Fort Yukon to be set into the shaft of the cross above the snow line. This tablet bears the record of Archdeacon Stuck's birth and death, and, in English and in the Indian tongue, the words—

"Well done, good and faithful servant."

The cost of this rugged and appropriate memorial at the Archdeacon's grave is $325. This is considerably less than would have been the case if a stone had been shipped from this country.

Bishop Rowe has asked the Secretary of the Department of Missions to give Archdeacon Stuck's friends an opportunity to provide this tribute of their affection and admiration. Those who desire to act upon Bishop Rowe's suggestion may communicate with Dr. John W. Wood, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

BRINGING IN THE KINGDOM.

The first move of a church awakening to the need of some change in social relations will not be "back to Christ." He is not in the rear, "no inspiration comes from the rear." He is in front, "climbing up new Calvaries ever with the cross that turns not back." The first request of such a church will be for a higher valuation of prayer and for greater efficiency in praying. "Lord, teach us to pray." And there is no reason to suppose that He would replace the prayer He gave His disciples by any other form. His first petition—for "Hallowed be Thy name" is an ascription rather than a petition—would be today, as it was then, "Thy kingdom come." That kingdom was always first in Christ's thoughts, whether He was praying or preaching. "Seek first the kingdom of God," He said to those to whom He was counselling. Ideal conditions are to be sought. They cannot be imposed on the world. They will come when they are so appreciated as to be looked for, prayed for, worked for. "The kingdom for which Christ prayed has a triple meaning," says Professor Harnack. "First, it is supernatural. It is a gift from above, not the product of our ordinary life. Second, it is purely a religious blessing, an inner link with the living God. Third, it is the most important experience a man can have."

That kingdom, it was once thought, was synonymous with the Church. There are little sects that so teach still. But the kingdom for which Christ prayed, wherever it is, is the kingdom in which the King is the Father. "Our Father," He begins. The glory of this King is not official, but personal. It is paternity, fatherhood. It is the kingdom in which all subjects who recognize the fatherhood are in filial relation to their Father. "This lifts all humanity above heaven and earth." "It is the assertion of the infinite worth of each individual person." They all counsel and co-operate with Him. Their labor is not enforced; it is glad and joyous. They who have this filial relation toward Him are in a fraternal relation toward each other. "All ye are brethren." The law of the jungle, the battle field and the forum, is to give way among these brethren to the law of the home. Love for the Father is most fully expressed in doing something for each other. In that kingdom one will is supreme, and all other wills are to be in harmony with it. "Our wills are ours," freedom; "our wills are ours, we know not how," mystery; "our wills are ours to make them thine," harmony.—Charles Wood, D. D.

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor.

DEALING WITH THE DELINQUENT.

An unusual thing happened the other day in the State of Virginia. A man who was working as a prisoner in a road camp was granted a pardon by the Governor and he refused to accept it, saying he would rather remain and serve out his term than to accept the clemency of the Governor.

His friends in Richmond had been very busy in his behalf, and had visited the Governor, had done what is required by the Executive in such cases, and that is to secure the recommendation of the trial judge and prosecuting attorney. In fact, a lot of trouble had been taken for this young man, and then he refused pardon.

Unusual, wasn't it?

However, it was not quite so extraordinary as it sounds.

The Governor of Virginia has often heard, no doubt, the phrase, "Temper justice with mercy," and he has often acted on it, too, to the writer's knowledge, but he has also added two more important words to that old expression. He tempers justice with mercy and wisdom.

This Executive has shown mercy in granting many pardons, and he has exercised wisdom in making practically all of these pardons conditional.

The distinction and importance between a plain pardon and a conditional one is not always understood by the public, and in order to make it plain it is necessary to discuss the situation of the man who is in jail or the penitentiary, and in doing so let us remember that there is no class of persons in whom Christian people should take so great an interest as in those who have gone so far wrong and in such a flagrant way as to have been convicted of crime of a nature that entails a prison sentence, for, as St. Paul puts it, "this is a true saying and worthy of all men to be received that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." These ex-convicts are certainly dear to the heart of our Lord, therefore anything that can be done to help to save them is of vital importance.

Some people, some Church people, seem to think that because a man has sinned so grievously as to have to serve a jail sentence, that he is beyond hope, and that having sinned to that extent once he is sure to do so again, and those who do much work with such persons must honestly admid that there is good reason for this general opinion.

The fact is that having once committed a crime creates a tendency in a man to do that same thing over again, just as a person who has had pneumonia once is more likely to take it again, but this very tendency toward weakness should only inspire us with a greater solicitude.

Now the time when this weakness and tendency to relapse is the greatest is when a man first leaves the penitentiary and is becoming accustomed to his restored freedom, and is trying to re-establish himself in respectable circumstances; that is the time of the hardest struggle, and when he most needs a friend and to realize that there is some one to whom he is definitely responsible.

This brings us to the wisdom of the policy of the conditional pardon. Under such a pardon a man is required to comply with certain conditions, usually to report regularly to a probation officer, who, if he is the right type of man, will try to secure work for his ward, and do everything possible to help and uphold him, but who will also have the authority to return him into custody, if it becomes necessary to do so.

Thus it will be seen that a conditional pardon does not mean freedom, but only a stepping-stone to freedom under wise guidance.

This accounts for the refusal of the prisoner that we first referred to to accept a pardon. He did not want to have to report regularly and give an account of his conduct to a duly authorized o cer. He may feel that his experience in a road camp will be sufficient punishment to keep him straight without any further supervision, or he may not be planning to lead the kind of life over which he will desire to have any supervision.

Some States have sufficiently realized the importance of this method of semi-freedom as to have well established parole and probation systems, which, to some extent, entirely displace the old method of imprisonment for all offenders.

In Massachusetts, for instance, on September 30, 1919, there were 15,303 on probation and only 2,896 in prisons, while on the same date in the State of Virginia there were 1,500 on probation, mostly children, and 2,690 in prisons, penitentiary and road camps. From these figures we see that out of a criminal population of about 18,000, over 15,000, or five-sixths, are on probation, while in Virginia, with a criminal population of about 4,000, there are over 2,500, or five-eighths, in confinement. Now these figures have a dollar and cents value as well as humanitarian. According to a reliable authority on this subject, it costs about $25 per year to supervise a man on probation, while it costs $202 to maintain a man in the penitentiary. Therefore, the 18,000 criminal population of Massachusetts costs the State $967,567, while the criminal population of about 4,000 in Virginia costs the State $580,880, or with less than one-fourth as many criminals in Virginia as there are in Massachusetts, it costs her more than half as much to support them.

It has been the policy of the Governor of Virginia so to exercise his pardoning power as to build up the probation system in the State, so that its advantages will become sufficiently apparent to encourage more favorable legislation along these lines, for probation gives the offender an opportunity to prove to the world and to himself that he would rather live the square life than degenerate into a mere crook. It holds out a helping hand. It aids in putting a person on his feet, starts him anew and guides his footsteps until they are well along in the right road.

On the subject of this method of preventive dealing with criminals. Sir Evelyn Ruggles Bryce, for many years director of prison administration in England, says:

"England, I believe, stands alone in its adoption of the system of preventive detention—one of the most notable reforms of recent years for dealing with the habitual criminal. The success of the system, so far as it has gone, goes far to justify belief in the virtue of indetermination of sentence. Public opinion may not be ripe for this yet, as applied to ordinary crime, but the system which preventive detention illustrates—namely, the careful observation of the history, character and prospects on discharge by an advisory committee on the spot, with a view to the grant of conditional freedom, furnishes in a different sphere an interesting example of the value of 'individualization.'

"The strict condition of release is that a man places himself under the care and supervision, not of the police, but of a State association, organized and subsidized by the government, but entirely controlled by a body of unofficial workers, who keep him under strict but kindly supervision, provide him with employment and lodgings, but unfailingly report him to the authorities if he fails to observe any one of the conditions on which freedom has been granted."

"One broad deduction is that so long as the classical conception of punishment remained—that is, the mechanical application of the letter of the law to an abstract type of offender—no great impression was being made either in the number or character of offenses. Statistics varied from year to year under the influences of special circumstances; but the great stage army of offenders in all the categories continued its unbroken array, with a monotonous regularity, and it seemed almost a mockery to talk of social progress, when, in the background, was the silent, ceaseless tramp of this multitude of men, women and children, finding no rest but behind prison walls, and only issuing thence to re-enter again.

Church Intelligence

Work of the Commission on the Ministry.

The Commission on the Ministry of the Presiding Bishop and Council has undertaken and accomplished a difficult and important task in preparing a list of the best books on the theological studies required by the canons of the Church for candidates for Holy Orders.

It is significant of the finer spirit of the Church that a body of men representing such widely divergent types of churchmanship should be able to come to a unanimous agreement on such a list of books.

The list covers the following subjects: Holy Scriptures, Church History, Christian Missions, Doctrine, Christian Ethics and Moral Theology, Liturgics, Ecclesiastical Politics and Canon Law, and Ministration.

It was prepared by a special committee of the Commission on the Ministry who by extensive correspondence secured the best expert opinions. The list, as drawn up by the committee, was then submitted to the entire Commission, and after some changes approved book by book.

Such a list of books should be of great value to candidates for Holy Orders, especially those unable to attend a theological school. It should also prove helpful to men already in Orders in continuing their studies. It will also be suggestive to not a few of the more thoughtful laymen. The fact that the Presiding Bishop and Council are publishing this list of books as an issue of the Bulletin, thus placing it in the hands of every clergyman of the Church, is evidence of the value they attach to it.

Copies of this list, when issued, may be had on application to the Department of Religious Education, 289 Fourth Avenue, New York, or to the Executive Secretary of the Province of New England, the Rev. Malcolm Taylor, 1 Joy Street, Boston, Mass.

Hobart College Fund.

Preparations are now being made for the opening of an active campaign for the $600,000 needed to complete Hobart College's Million Dollar Centennial Fund. The first step will be a campaign in the Diocese of Western New York with the active support of Bishop Brent, Chancellor of Hobart College.

Bishop Brent has designated October 2 as Hobart Sunday and the week following as Hobart Week in all the parishes of the Diocese. On Hobart Sunday a pastoral letter from Bishop Brent, calling upon the communicants of the Diocese to support the college that has served them for a hundred years, will be read from every pulpit. Nation-Wide Campaign committees will co-operate.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Noon-Day Prayer at the Diocesan Offices.

On Friday, September 16, Bishop Brown inaugurated a custom of having noon-day prayer at the Diocesan Offices, 400 Old Dominion Trust Building, Richmond. One end of these offices has been fitted up as an oratory, and hereafter from day to day the members of the diocesan staff will devote ten or fifteen minutes at the noon-day hour to the holding of these mid-day services of prayer, for missions, for religious education and for social service. This has been for many years a cherished custom both at the Church Missions House in New York and also in many parts of the mission field. Now that the offices of the Diocese of Virginia have become well established and the growing diocesan staff insures the daily presence of at least a few, this beautiful custom is being commenced. Clergy and laity who find it opportune to drop in at the noon-day hour will be most cordially welcomed.

Plans for the Work of the Nation-Wide Campaign.

Under the revised Canon of the Diocese, at the recent meeting of the Council in Charlottesville, the conduct of the Nation-Wide Campaign was placed under the Board of Apportionment of the Diocesan Missionary Society. This Board consists of twenty members, of which the Bishop is chairman and the Rev. G. M. Brydon secretary.

The Board of Apportionment held an important meeting on Tuesday, September 13, at the Bishop's residence, with a full attendance of members. The plans for the carrying on of the work were outlined by a preliminary committee, which had been working on them previous to the meeting, and were approved by the Board. A committee consisting of the Rev. G. M. Brydon as Executive Secretary, and the Rev. Messrs. W. D. Smith, D. D., W. H. Burkhardt, and W. E. Cox, was appointed as the Executive Committee of the Nation-Wide Campaign for the fall work. This committee has already sent to every clergyman in the Diocese and to the parish Nation-Wide Campaign chairman of every vacant parish, a folder outlining the plans of the campaign, and a blank for report to the Diocesan Office of the parish organization.

One of the chief features of the campaign in the Diocese will be the cottage prayer meetings for discussion of selected topics bearing on the campaign, and for intercession. The plans will include the districting of every parish in such a way that all members of the parish will be included in these cottage meetings. The literature for the meetings has already been prepared and will be in the hands of the parish chairmen in ample time.

Nation-Wide Campaign Meetings.

A meeting of the clergy of the Valley Convocation was held in Christ Church, Millwood, the Rev. B. D. Chambers, rector, on Thursday, September 15, at which time the fall plans for the carrying on of the work were outlined by the Rev. G. M. Brydon, the Executive Secretary.

A meeting of the clergy and representative laymen and laywomen from the parishes in the Rappahannock Convocation was held in St. Peter's Church, Oak Grove, the Rev. Thomas P. Baker, rector, on the same date, at which time the plans of the campaign were outlined by the Rev. W. D. Smith, D. D., and Miss Louisa T. Davis.

Similar meetings will be held in the other convocations as follows: In Richmond, on September 29th; in the Albemarle Convocation, at Ivy Depot, September 27-29; and at various points in the Piedmont Convocation from October 2-6. Due notice of these meetings will be sent to all the clergy in these respective districts.

Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor.

Improvements in St. Paul's, Berkeley.

St. Paul's Church, Berkeley, Norfolk, the Rev. R. R. Phelps, rector, which has been closed for repairs and improvements for several weeks during the summer, will, it is expected, be ready for services by next Sunday. The interior of the church has been redecorated and otherwise improved, the entire cost of the work being $1,500.

St. Andrew's, Norfolk: It is expected that the New St. Andrew's Church, Norfolk, the Rev. M. B. Marshall, rector, will be ready for worship early in October. All of the interior decorations have been finished, the handsome stained glass and memorial windows have been placed and the big electrically operated organ installed.

The Rev. Walter Archbold, D. D., of St. Andrew's Church, Princess Anne, Somerset County, Md., has accepted the call to the rectorship of St. Peter's Church, Brambleton, Norfolk, and expects to take charge October 1. Dr. Archbold is a native of England, and was educated at Trinity University, Toronto, Can., and at Cambridge University, England. He received his degree of D. D. from St. John's College, Annapolis, Md.

The Rev. Charles H. Holmead, formerly rector of St. John's Church, Wilmington, Del., was instituted rector of Trinity Church, Norfolk, on Sunday, September 11, by Bishop Tucker, who also made an address. Mr. Holmead was the preacher at the morning and evening services, large congregations being present at both services to greet him.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Clergy Return From Vacations: Work Resumed.

Several of the clergy of the Diocese have returned to the city just in time for their services on Sunday, September 18, having taken their vacations later in the summer. Dr. C. Ernest Smith, rector of St. Thomas' Church, has recently returned from a six weeks' visit to England, where he visited his daughter, Miss Marcella Smith. Miss Smith is studying art in St. Ives, and has already gained the distinction of having four of her pictures hung in the Royal Academy. The Rev. Charles E. McAllister, rector of St. Matthew's Church, Hyattsville, was in his chancel on September 18 also, for the first time since his return from his vacation. Dr. Robert Talbot, rector of St. Paul's Church, and the Rev. James H. W. Blake, rector of Christ Church, Georgetown, both of whom were in Blue Ridge Summit, Pa., have also returned to their charges. The Sunday schools are becoming reorganized and many of the choirs are getting to work also. Activity in the Church in Washington seems out of the question in the summer time, and while the absence from the city of so many of the people justifies this to a large extent, it is unfortunate that so little Sunday school provision is made for the many children who stay in town all summer. Fortunately, there are a few Sunday schools that remain open, and it is to be hoped that others will gradually come to follow their example.

Washington Church people are glad to see announcements of the services of St. Paul's Church, Alexandria, in the Washington Saturday evening papers. Dr. Hall, the new rector of St. Paul's, is well known to the Church in Washington, and these announcements beside those of the Washington churches emphasize the fact that Dr. Hall, after all, has not gone so far away. Washington and Alexandria are so near each other geographically that there is great opportunity for each to profit by greater co-operation with the other. Alexandria Church people and clergy are sometimes present at diocesan meetings in Washington, and are always most cordially welcome.

WEST VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Rev. A. B. Mitchell is giving three services a month to St. John's Church, Rippon.

Mr. Gehri, a student of Gambier Seminary, Ohio, who has been in charge of Trinity Parish, Shepherdstown, since the last week in June, leaves the first of October.

The Northwestern Convocation convenes at Grace Church, Elkins, W. Va., the Rev. E. Nelson MaConomy, rector, the last week in September. The rector and officers of the Convocation have their plans well under way and a splendid program has been prepared.

Peterkin Hall, the large academic hall which Miss Duval has erected as an addition to St. Hilda's Hall, Charles Town, is nearing completion, and contains a large assembly hall, music hall, various class-rooms, art and music-rooms and a laboratory. The formal dedication will be on All Saints' Day, when there will be a large gathering of the friends of the school.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Coadjutor.

Christ Church, Raleigh, to Hold Centennial Observance.

Christ Church, Raleigh, the Rev. Milton A. Barber, rector, will observe its one hundredth anniversary with appropriate ceremonies, beginning Sunday, October 9, and continuing through Wednesday, October 12. The program includes three great services on Sunday, with the Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, D. D., as the chief speaker, and Bishop Cheshire will give personal recollections or sketches of former rectors the same evening. Monday night Marshall De Lancey Haywood will read a historical review of the parish since its formation, and Captain S. A. Ashe will contribute reminiscences. Tuesday the beautiful chapel adjoining the parish home will be consecrated; and in the evening the choir will render Whitney Coomb's "Ancient of Days." Wednesday night a reception for the members of the parish and friends will be held. Christ Church is one of the historic parishes of the Diocese, and a roster of its members since its formation would include the names of patriots and soldiers, Cabinet officers, governors, diplomats, jurists of renown, and men eminent in every walk of life. Preparations are in active progress for the centennial, and former members scattered over widely separated sections are expected to make this a time of home-coming to the old mother parish. The great Confederate Bishop-General Leonidas Polk and Bishop John Watrus Beckwith, of Georgia, were both reared in Christ Church Parish, and Bishop John Stark Ravenscroft was its first rector.

Diocesan School for Boys to Open Shortly.

St. Nicholas' School, the new Church School for Boys for the Diocese of North Carolina, will open shortly in Raleigh. It will begin as a day school, to develop into a first-class boarding school in the near future. Plans for proper buildings are already under way. The principals are the Rev. I. Harding Hughes, for several years teaching in schools in New England, preparing for this work, and his father, the Rev. Dr. N. Colin Hughes, whose work in his school at Chocowinity is well known.

MARYLAND

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

Lay Cornerstone of Church of the Messiah.

The cornerstone of the new Church of the Messiah, Baltimore, was laid by Bishop John G. Murray, Monday, September 12. The old Church of the Messiah, known for so many years in the business district of Baltimore, where many famous preachers have addressed mid-day Lenten congregations, was sold last year and has been converted into a moving picture theatre. With the proceeds the rector, the Rev. Peregrine Wroth, D. D., and vestry selected a site in a rapidly growing section on the outskirts of Baltimore City, and have planned a very complete set of buildings, including the church and parish house. The old Messiah was formerly Christ Church, and when the new Christ Church was established uptown the old church remained with the new name. By reason of this association, as well as because of long personal attachment, the Rev. Dr. Edwin Barnes Niver, now chaplain in the United States Navy, and for twenty-five years connected with Christ Church, both as assistant and as rector, delivered the address. Dr. Wroth has been longest in service of any clergyman in the Diocese, and is today one of the most active and vigorous of the clergy, full of vision for the future. To commemorate this new enterprise and also as a testimonial of their affection, the vestry of the Church of the Messiah have just given their rector an automobile.

The Carry On Committee of the Nation-Wide Campaign is planning to meet the challenge of the present conditions of the Church's treasury—first by a mass meeting for Church people in the city of Baltimore on Sunday night, October 23. Bishop Murray will preside. The Rev. Dr. James E. Freeman, of Washington, will be the speaker. During the remaining months of 1921 every effort will be made to reach all the parishes of the Diocese, with the hope of maintaining the good record which Maryland made last year.

Two large parishes in Baltimore still remain vacant. Christ Church lost the Rev. Mr. Huston, who went to San Antonio, Tex. The Church of the Ascension gave its rector to be Missionary Bishop of the Hawaiian Islands. The Rev. Christopher P. Sparling comes from the Diocese of Washington to take charge of the Church of the Prince of Peace, Baltimore. St. John's, Hagerstown, is also without a rector, the Rev. S. Hilton Orrick having recently resigned.

Centennial Essay Contest.

Rules for a diocesan essay contest in connection with the Centennial plans have just been issued. The contest is open to any member of the senior and junior departments of the Church schools, and the subject is "The Missionary History of the Church." The first prize for the seniors is $10, second $5; the first for the juniors is $5, second $2.50. The contest will close on November 15, and the winners will be announced in the Church schools the first Sunday in Advent, November 27.

Laymen Assist Rector in Services.

At the Wednesday evening service of St. Paul's Church, Augusta, lay readers are assisting the rector, the Rev. G. Sherwood Whitney. The rector reports that the laymen are learning to say something in fifteen minutes, which "is not an easy thing to do." The congregations in this parish during the month of August have been most satisfactory, witnessing to the fact that very few seem to be taking vacations from religion during the hot weather.

Christ Church Mission, Augusta, located in the mill section, where the rector of St. Paul's is in charge, is having increasingly large congregations. Mr. Whitney holds service every Sunday evening and is assisted by some of the lay readers of his parish. On a recent Sunday the congregation was 50 per cent. larger than usual, and the attendance at the Church school that day was sixty. The church building is soon to have a new roof costing $300, of which amount $200 is already in hand.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

An Unusual Condition.

At the first fall meeting of the Tuesday Lunch Club of Christ Church, Williamsport, held Tuesday, September 13, in the parish house, the rector, the Rev. Charles Noyes Tyndell, called attention to a situation which he considers places Christ Church Parish in a unique position, the parish having in its membership five young men who are preparing to enter the ministry. Three of these young men—Clifford L. Stanley, who is leaving Thursday to enter the University of Virginia; Harold E. Miller, who will enter Hobart College, Geneva, N. Y., next week, and Hugh M. MacMullan—were present. Dr. Tyndall said that he had watched the progress of these young men, and that it was the happiest moment of his life to see them preparing to dedicate their lives to Christian service.

My Plea.

Anna B. Bensel.

I would be patient, Lord,
Unfretful and still:
Waiting Thy plan for me,
Work out Thy will.

Strengthen my faith, I pray,
When dark clouds shall roll.
Let Thy peace cover me—
Folding my soul.

So keep me patient, Lord:
Unswerving in trust.
Then may I win the Life—
Springing from dust.

The Sign of the Double Cross.

In his ragged clothes and battered hat, he stood in the rain and studied the marks on the gate-post. The marks were merely two little crosses, scarcely visible, and might have been carved by a boy with a jack-knife. To this unkempt creature the marks were indisputable evidence of danger. They were a warning sign, and the hieroglyphics of beggardom said plainly: "Cross dog; cross woman."

There was nothing about the house that indicated such a condition. It was not big; but it was neat and tidy and the yard was well kept. Moreover, there was no dog in sight.

It was the last house on the street, and his was the hunger of a man who has tramped a whole day through the rain with nothing to eat; so this unkempt creature was most reluctant to pass it by. Every door in the town had been closed to him. Everywhere his pleading for a bite to eat had fallen on deaf ears. Even his offer to work was not heard. Impending starvation made him desperate, and he decided to run the risk.

He entered the gate and shambled around the house to the back door.

His eyes were on the alert for the dog that must certainly slide from under the porch and pounce upon him. Great was his surprise to find his passage from the gate to the kitchen door unhampered.

Greater still was his astonishment when his timid appeal for "a bite to eat, ma'am, please," was given a sympathetic ear by a kindly, sweet-faced woman.

He appended his request with the assurance that he would gladly work to pay for whatever was given to him.

The woman directed him to the woodhouse, telling him that when he split enough wood to pay for his meal he might come in and eat.

It was queer—this remarkable show of hospitality. And with a remembrance of the warning sign full upon him, the man took the precaution to ask: "Where is the dog, ma'am, please? He might attack me."

"We have no dog," the woman answered.

No dog! The man was surprised, but said nothing. He set industriously to his work, and when done he had split a big, round pile. Then he entered the house, and the woman invited him to a chair at the kitchen table, where a lot of tempting eatables were set for him.

He dropped his battered hat at his feet and slid into the chair, scarcely raising his eyes. He was young and muscular, and had it not been for his ragged attire and unshaven face he would have been good-looking.

The woman eyed him pityingly. There was a sparkle in his steel-gray eyes, a peculiar shapeliness and bigness about his head, with its mass of brown curls, that did not belong to the ordinary tramp. "He's some mother's boy to whom fortune has been unkind," she thought, as she went back to her sewing in the sitting-room and left him to his meal.

Just as he eagerly clutched the cup of fragrant coffee, the inner door opened and there was a patter of little feet on the floor. In an instant a pair of merry brown eyes gazed up into his face, and a four-year-old boy's voice piped out, "Hello, man!"

The man shifted uneasily in his chair, but made no reply. Anyhow, he was very hungry and it annoyed him to talk.

The boy kept his eyes upon the man. He had never seen a piece of beef attacked so viciously except by a half-starved dog. He waited some little time for a reply, and, getting none, walked up boldly and touched the stranger on the arm with the grave remark, "Say, man, I said, Hello!"

This demanded a reply, and the man tried to give it, but his mouth was full, and the best that he could do was to smile and nod.

This pantomime led the boy to make the further enquiry, "Can you talk, man?"

The tramp grinned over his plate and replied instantly, "A little bit."

Amply satisfied and with the unquestioning confidence of childhood, the boy dragged up a chair and seated himself at the other end of the table. "My name's Robert, but they call me 'Boy Blue,'" the little fellow volunteered, looking into the stranger's face. "What's your name?"

"Mine is Ralph, but they call me 'Brakerod Kink,' the man replied with a smile.

"Why do they call you that?" asked the little fellow.

"It's a long, long story," the tramp replied, his eyes to the floor.

"I like stories," the boy remarked.

"But this one is too long," the man declared. "Tell me why they call you 'Boy Blue.'"

"'Cause I'm like Boy Blue was. Don't you know who Boy Blue was?"

"No, who was he?" the stranger asked innocently.

"Why, he's the little boy who lost his sheep," quickly answered the lad. Then he quoted:

"Where's the boy who lost his sheep?
He's under the haystack fast asleep."

The tramp beamed upon him admiringly.

"It's fun to sleep under a haystack," prattled the boy. "I slept under one once. I was out to Uncle Mark's. He lives on a farm. Did you ever sleep under a haystack?"

"A few times," the tramp confessed with evident amusement.

"Wasn't it nice? All except the cockle burrs. They got in my hair. Did they get in yours?"

"Just a few of them," the man answered.

"Mamma had a dreffful time getting them out of mine. Did your mamma take them out of yours?"

The smile left the man's face and he compressed his teeth fiercely, as if the question hurt. His only reply was a nod of his head.

"The other Boy Blue runned away. So did I one day when I was naughty. That's when I was out to Uncle Mark's. Did you ever run away?"

"Once," said the stranger simply, as he gazed forlornly out of the window. His hunger seemed suddenly to leave him, and the good breakfast was half forgotten.

"Your mamma came after you?" The little fellow opened his eyes wide and gazed into the man's face. He did not see the tears that glittered on the stranger's cheek. When no answer came to his question, he passed it over and prattled on. "It's awful nice to be hugged up tight by your mamma when you've runned away and she's found you, isn't it?"

The man lifted the coffee to his lips and choked on the hasty draught. Tears dripped into the cup, but he drank on, unmindful of them.

The boy excused the refusal to answer in his belief that the choking was genuine, and continued his chatter.

"'Cause I was a bad boy when I runned away, I was afraid my mamma would not love me any more. But it seemed she just loved me more'n ever after that. I was awful sorry I had been naughty, and I told her so and asked her to forgive me. I promised I would never run away again; and she forgave me and kissed me, and I felt so good I cried. It's funny how mammas can make you cry by being good to you, but they can. Didn't you cry when your mamma was good to you the time you runned away and she found you?"

A smothered groan burst from the stranger as he pushed his plate from him and guiltily dropped his head. "She hasn't found me yet," he muttered.

In the little fellow's breast beat the happy heart of a child, but he was filled with the intuition that something was wrong. "Then you must be lost," he conjectured, his big eyes opening apprehensively.

The downcast look on the stranger's face assured the lad that his premonition was true.

"Could you find your way home if you'd try real hard?"

"I guess I could," the man said.

"Then you'd better try. Your mamma will be awful worried. Mammas are funny that way. You just tell her that you're sorry, and promise her that you'll never run away any more. Won't you try it?"

The stranger sat motionless. His breakfast, half eaten, was getting cold before him. But this, after all, was the sort of good he craved. What his starving soul most needed was the nourishing food of a mother's love and a mother's devotion. He gazed in silence out of the window, his mind busy with retrospect. He could feel the warmth of the gaze from the baby face across the table. At last, with an apparent effort, he arose from his chair.

"Is you goin' to see your mamma?" the little fellow questioned eagerly.

"Yes, my little man," he answered resolutely. He reached for his hat and walked around to where the boy sat.

The lad's mother came from the other room and looked in at the door just as the stranger stooped and lightly kissed the little fellow's cheek.

"Good-by, Boy Blue," said he. "You've made a new man of me. I will go home to mother."

"Good-by," the boy replied. "I hope you'll find her all right."

The stranger passed out of the door and down the walk, not with the shambling, hang-dog air of a beggar with which he had approached the house only a short time before, but with the brisk step, the erect head and square shoulders of a man. He paused long enough at the gate to use his knife on the warning sign. "It's all a mistake," he muttered. "This is no house of the double cross." He scratched out one of the crosses and shaped the other into the form of a crude figure with wings. Instead of the former warning, the sign now read, "An angel lives here."—Selected.

Helen Hunt Jackson's Faith.

Helen Hunt Jackson was not only a great writer, but a deeply religious woman. The following exquisite poem reveals her character as, by faith, she walked with the Master:

Blindfolded and alone I stand
With unknown thresholds on each hand;
The darkness deepens as I grope,
Afraid to fear, afraid to hope:
Yet this one thing I learned to know
Each day more surely as I go,
That doors are opened, ways are made,
Burdens are lifted or are laid,
By some great law unseen and still,
Unfathomed purpose to fulfill,
"Not as I will."

Blindfolded and alone I wait,
Loss seems too bitter, gain too late;
Too heavy burdens in the load,
And too few helpers on the road;
And joy is weak and grief is strong,
And years and days so long, so long;
Yet this one thing I learn to know
Each day more surely as I go,
That I am glad the good and ill
By changeless law are ordered still
"Not as I will."

"Not as I will!"—the sound grows sweet
Each time my lips the words repeat,
"Not as I will!"—the darkness feels
More safe than light when His thought steals
Like whispered voice to calm and bless
All unrest and all loneliness.
"Not as I will," because the One
Who loved us first and best has gone
Before us on the road, and still
For us must all His love fulfill—
"Not as we will."

The Gift of One Language.

Wordsworth tells us that our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting. The new birth is an awakening and a remembering. At Pentecost the converts rubbed their eyes and said to each other, "Here we are after the nightmare, back in our Father's home, where we have all things in common." It is significant that they began at once to drop their labels. They came to Jerusalem, as foreigners come to America, filled with local patrioitsm, but in Christ they were no longer Parthians and Medes and Jews and proselytes. It is only a side reference that tells us that Paul belonged to the tribe of Benjamin and who knows whether Luke was a Gentile He was a beloved physician, with 100 per cent. loyalty to Paul, the prisoner, and Paul's Master. Whatever he had been by nationality, he was now a true man among men.

Becoming all things to all men is not easy. What was miracle at Pentecost became humility in the great apostle of the nations. With infinite self-restraint, he behaved as a Jew to the Jews and a Greek to the Greeks. Deliberately he got into touch with labor by working as a tent-maker. Here was loving your neighbor as yourself—here was looking also on the things of others. It was an eager, concentrated, winning look. The man, lame from his mother's womb, had never been regarded with such a piercing attention as that devoted to him by Peter and John. The one language of Christ was also the most intense language and the spiritual intuition of the apostles stopped the very heart-beats of Ananias and Sapphira.

Universal, intense, simple—that was the speech of the Spirit. The idea that we talk and write well when we use long words is not of Christ. An evil church in Corinth hoped to display spiritual gifts by praying in an unknown tongue, and even today a great communion holds forth the message in ancient Latin. Much theology is almost as hard to comprehend, and there is a wisdom of words that makes the cross of Christ of none effect. As Paul told Timothy to let no man despise his youth, so on his own behalf, he let no man despise a child-like gospel. In the presence of God let the syllables be few—one is enough for sin. For as our Saviour still stands at the door of those hearts which He loved unto death, He is content with a brief knock—merely a knock—which however leaves a stain of life blood from wounds on a hand not yet healed. That knock arrests our notice, and those who listen as John did for the voice will hear a sound of many waters, many tears—a language known the whole world over—flowing with infinite patience and sympathy through every cranny of human experience—and gathering volumes unto itself until the voice of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.—P. W. Wilson, in The Church We Forget.

A Door Opened.

Before the bank three or four persons are waiting for the great doors to be unlocked. How heavy and strong they are! You might dash yourself to pieces against them and they would not give so much as a fraction of an inch.

A clock begins to strike. At the ninth stroke a clerk appears behind the door and on the inside of the heavy plate-glass window hangs a card bearing the words, "The Bank Is Open." Then he turns a key in the lock of the doors and, drawing it out again, returns to his work. The people outside press up the steps. The foremost person puts his shoulder against one of the leaves of the door. It swings slowly back, and the people enter the opened door—opened, not by the shoulder of the man without, but by the key of the man within.

As I passed on down the street I thought of the sign hanging there in the window, announcing that the bank was open. The doors indeed were shut, but the bank was not. Any one with business there was free to enter. He could push confidently against the closed doors, for he knows that the clerk always turns the key at nine o'clock, and that the turning of the key opens the bank.

The doors of opportunity are much like the doors of the bank. The Master holds the key to every door. He urges us to go forward to service and accomplishment, though again and again the doors appear to us to be closed. But really they are not shut against us. Christ has said, "Behold, I have set before thee an open door." He does not mean that He has removed every obstacle from our path. He does mean that He has turned the key in the lock and that what we could not do before we now can do. The door is opened, but we must approach it in faith and set our shoulder to the task of pushing it back so that we can enter.

How many times we come to the doors of opportunity and, finding them apparently closed, have turned away discouraged; whereas if we had only had faith and courage we should have found that the door would swing open before us if we made any genuine effort.—Youth's Companion.

Love and Social Service.

When a mother loves, though she be a queen, she becomes interested in soap and water, sheets and blankets, boots and clothing and many other mundane things. And when the Church loves she will have something to say about rents and wages, houses and workshops, food and clothing, gardens, drains, medicine and many other things. Where is the Church's mother-love? Where is her fierce mother-wrath, as she sees the children trampled in the mire? It is easy to go to church, and to abstain from drinking, swearing and gambling, but it is not easy to love. Love brings labor, and sorrow and self-sacrifice. Love sometimes says, "Sell all that thou hast, and distribute unto the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come, follow Me." This is not like going to a home missionary meeting and giving the price of a meal to the collection. It is leaving beautiful houses, and pictures, and gardens, and music, and going into mean streets and dirty dwellings. It is leaving congenial friends and joyous fellowships for service among the unfortunate, unattractive, and perhaps depraved. It is giving where you cannot hope to receive in return. There is the sweat of heart and of brain, the carrying of sickness and sorrows. To your own cares and troubles there is added the unspeakable trouble of the multitude.—Thomas Tiplady.

The cheery caller tried to persuade old Aunt Martha not to dwell upon her troubles, telling her she would feel happier if she ignored them. "Well, honey," said the old lady, "I dunno 'bout dat. I allus 'lowed when de Lord send me tribulations He done spec' me to tribulate."—Boston Transcript.

"To do His will we never shirk,
We enjoy every trip.

"You should, my small, inquiring friend
Smile—not just when you play,
But, work or play, unto the end
Of every single day."

The Maid of Honor.

Polly stood and gazed at the pretty clothes laid out on the bed all ready for her to put on. She wondered if Cousin Mary Lillian, the bride, could possibly feel any more important and happy than she, the maid of honor, felt. She put out her hand and stroked first the white organdie ruffles of the dress, then the soft pink sash, and then the long silk stockings. All the time she was gazing at the satin slippers, slender, arched and shining. Surely, of all the lovely things, those slippers were the loveliest; even the bride's own slippers were no more charming. Polly clasped her hands.

"Oh, the beauties!" she cried.

She was still a little dazed when her mother came in to help her dress. It did seem strange, she thought, that a stout and somewhat over-grown little girl with straight dark hair should be about to turn into a white-robed maid of honor. But, though it was like magic, it was true.

Cousin Mary Lilian had always lived in Polly's father's house. She had no sisters of her own, and when she decided to marry almost the first thing she said was, "I don't want any bridesmaids, but I do want Polly for my maid of honor!"

When Polly heard that she had jumped up and down with delight.

"But the maid of honor will be bigger than the bride," some one remarked, and then the little girl's heart had sunk, for there was no denying that she was large for her age, and Cousin Mary Lilian was almost as little and light as a fairy. Dr. John, who was to be the bridegroom, said that if the wind blew hard on the wedding day he should have to put weights on his bride to keep her from blowing away.

Remembering all that, Polly stood very still with a stricken face. Then Dr. John came to the rescue. "If you try to find a maid of honor who is smaller than the bride," he said, "there won't be any wedding at all, and then what should I do?"

That settled it. Polly was safe. The very next day she went to town with mother and Cousin Mary Lilian to buy the organdie dress, the sash, the silk stockings—and the satin slippers. The slippers were the most important of all, Polly thought. They had buckles and rather high heels. Her mother was doubtful at first about the heels. "You mustn't wear them, you know, except at the wedding," she said.

"Oh, some one will find use for the slippers after that," Cousin Mary Lilian urged. "Let her have them just this once."

And so the slippers were ordered and became for a while the property of happy Polly.

As she stood and gazed at them on the day of the wedding her mother came in hurriedly.

"You must begin to dress right away, Polly," she said. "We've discovered that the train time has changed, and so the wedding has got to be put forward twenty minutes. Hurry, child; the bride is nearly dressed."

Polly was quite willing to hurry. She threw off her every-day dress, splashed hastily through her bath, brushed her dark hair, and in fifteen minutes was pulling on her stockings. She trembled with joy. How trim and slender those slippers looked, waiting on a nearby hassock; would the girls ever again laugh at her big feet and call her "Pudgy Polly "

"Hurry, Polly," her mother called. "I am ready to drop the dress right over your head."

"Coming," Polly said. "I've just got to put on my—"

She broke off in the act of putting on one of the slippers, for the door of her bedrom was suddenly flung open.

"Oh," said a voice, "the worst thing has happened! What shall we do?"

It was Lucy Brown speaking, one of the young neighbors who had come over to help the family get ready for the wedding. She looked scared and white.

"O, Lucy Brown," cried Polly and her mother at the same instant. "What has happened?"

"This," said Lucy, and held something up to their gaze—a strange-looking black and white object.

"What is it?" they cried again.

"It is the bride's slipper," said Lucy Brown solemnly.

Polly sat and blinked. The bride's slipper—that splotched and spotted thing?

Other girls came crowding in; they explained hurriedly, all talking at once. The slippers had been set aside on a table to keep them out of harm's way. In the bustle and confusion some one had knocked over an inkstand that stood near them; one slipper was untouched by the ink, but the other had been ruined. It was not a white slipper any longer, but something that looked as if it might have been rescued from the ash-barrel.

"Oh, poor, poor Cousin Mary Lilian!" Polly cried. "What will she do?"

One of the girls spoke in a frightened whisper. "She says she will not be married in black shoes or in old white ones either!"

"And of course she can't," the others echoed.

"But," said Polly's mother, "there is no shoe store within ten miles, and it is nearly train time."

"Then she will wait until another day." said Lucy Brown. "We can't make her change her mind."

With that they all turned and hurried away—all but Polly, the maid of honor, who still sat on the floor, ready to cry, with one slipper on and one slipper off. She was not thinking about herself, but about her cousin. The flowers were all in place, the minister had come, the people were waiting in the parlor; how dreadful to put off the wedding! What would poor Dr. John say? And all on account of a little pair of slippers! Polly blinked again.

And as she blinked, suddenly her glance fell on her own slippers.

"Oh!" said Polly. She sat perfectly still for half a minute and then she said, "O dear!"

For a thought had come to her—a surprising, overwhelming thought. Cousin Mary Lilian could easily wear Polly's shoes; Polly knew that, for she had often proved it. And here were the new slippers, white and speckless, and over in the room across the hall were those other slippers, and one was ruined. There was only one thing to do. - It was a hard thing, and the thought of it brought hot tears to Polly's eyes. But she scrambled to her feet, the slippers in her hand.

"A bride is more important than a maid of honor," she said with a sob, and away she went hurrying out of the room, pit-a-pat, in her white silk stockings. Well, it saved the day. When the bride looked up, her lovely face stained with tears, and saw Polly holding out the lovely slippers, she gave a little shriek of joy and grabbed her, slippers and all. No one had thought of Polly's slippers. They were the very, very thing.

"But poor Polly!" said Cousin Mary Lilian, radiant again as she pulled the slippers on her small feet. "What can she wear?"

"Perhaps she will have to give up being maid of honor," some one said doubtfully.

But some one else ran into the closet and found a pair of white canvas pumps, and presently Polly was putting those on in place of the white satin slippers.

"Every one will be looking at the bride, anyway," she said bravely. And the smile that Cousin Mary Lilian gave her was reward enough.

The wedding was a gay and happy one; no one dreamed how near it had come to being put off. The bride was beautiful, and every one spoke of the lovely color in the cheeks of her little attendant.

Two days later, with a letter from Cousin Mary Lilian, came a small package addressed to Polly. Deep down in the cotton wool that filled the package Polly found a little gold brooch; it was shaped like a very small shoe, and was set from heel to toe with tiny pearls. On the card attached to it was written, "For the best maid of honor that ever was, from the grateful bride and groom."

"My!" cried Polly, almost weeping with joy, "I'm glad I'm too big for my age!"—Nancy Byrd Turner, in Youth's Companion.

The Thing of the Most Worth.

There was once a very important king who was growing quite old and gray. He had three sons, Prince Proud and Prince Charming and Prince Great Heart, all fine, good boys, and for this reason it was hard to decide which should wear the crown when the king should not need it any longer.

Prince Proud was very important, and he stood up very straight as he held a standard beside his father's throne on days of the council. His eyes were blue and his golden hair was bright and shining in the sunlight. Prince Proud would make a very good king indeed, the court thought.

Prince Charming was very kind and thoughtful of the happiness and comfort of every one. Dressed in red velvet suit and with his brown head held high, he went about the throne room upon the days of the council saying pleasant words to all the lords and ladies. It seemed to every one that Prince Charming would make a very gracious king.

Prince Great Heart was the youngest and smallest of the three princes, and sometimes it seemed to his father, the king, that he was strangely different from his brothers. Prince Great Heart once changed his beautiful blue silk suit for the brown cotton smock of a little plough boy, because, as he exclaimed, he wanted to see if the plough boy's clothes would fit him. On the days of the king's council, which, every one knew, were the most important days of all, it was often hard to find Prince Great Heart. He would be off with the little court pages, or talking to the plough boy, or watching the ways of the brown squirrels and red foxes that lived in the forest about the palace. "Little, wandering Great Heart will not make a king at all," said certain of the court, and at times his father wondered if, after all, they were not right.

One morning at sunrise, when the dew was like diamonds on the roses in the palace garden and the towers and battlements glistened with sunshine gold, the king called his sons into his bed chamber.

"I am growing older each day, my princes," he said, "and less able to rule over my kingdom. I must choose which of you will take my place. To do this I will test you. Do you start out at once, Prince Proud and Prince Charming and Prince Great Heart, and, taking with you only four days' food, search the kingdom for the thing of most worth. What this is you must discover, but whichever of you finds it and brings it to me shall wear my crown and rule in my stead."

So the three princes started out to find the thing of most worth. They were all greatly puzzled, for they had not the slightest idea what it would be. Prince Proud searched in the great city which was the capital of the kingdom, for he thought that everything of importance must be stored there.

Prince Charming went to the neighboring castles, for he thought that his friends would tell him how to find the thing of most worth.

But Prince Great Heart went away from the city and away from the court down to the fields where the little plough boy lived, and no one could tell what he was thinking, for Great Heart's thoughts were very strange.

It was a long and busy day for the three princes. When night came they hurried back to the palace, where the king waited for them on his great, shining throne. They knelt down at his feet, first, and then he bade them rise.

"Who has brought me the thing of most worth," the king asked of the three.

"I have," shouted Prince Proud.

"No, I have," smiled Prince Charming. But little Prince Great Heart did not say a word.

"We shall see," said the king. "Show me." He pointed to Prince Proud, who drew from beneath his cloak a gold casket. Opened, the light of a hundred precious stones flashed red and white and violet.

"It is the treasure of the oldest miser in your kingdom," explained Prince Proud. "He instructed me to bring it to you."

The king took the casket of jewels and laid it aside, shaking his head sorrowfully. Then he motioned to Prince Charming.

The Prince Charming came forward and held up a precious bit of filmy lace. It was as soft as a cloud and as fine as a spider's web and as beautiful in pattern as a snow-flake.

"One of the princesses made it with her own hands," Prince Charming said. "She will wear it when she is presented to you. I could find nothing more valuable."

The king touched the lace gently, but he shook his head again. "What has my little Great Heart brought?" he asked.

"Nothing," said Prince Great Heart, holding out two empty hands. "I had no time to search. I stopped at the plough boy's farm and helped him all day with the ploughing, for his father is sick and furrows must be dug for the wheat." Two tears welled up in Great Heart's eyes.

"Come nearer, Great Heart," said the king. He took Great Heart's little hand in his. In the palm was a hard, rough spot where he had held a plough handle all day.

"Prince Great Heart has brought me the things of most worth," said the king as he touched the spot tenderly. "He brings to the kingdom the marks of unselfish work."

So Great Heart wore the king's crown, and although at first it was very large for him, every one said that this did not matter in the least, for he would soon grow to it.—Carolyn S. Bailey, in "Stories for Sunday Telling."

Give and Take.

The family had wondered a little doubtfully about her coming—this cousin who was an only child in a somewhat more luxurious home than theirs—for a whole summer's visit.

"She can have everything her own way at home. Her things stay where she puts them, and she doesn't have to look at everything and wonder how many pieces it can be cut into," said Dorothy, a trifle enviously. "She never goes looking for ribbons or envelopes to find that some one else has borrowed them, or that her books have been pushed away from the window where she meant to study, and some one's work-basket has taken their place. She lives in a house where all her belongings 'stay put,' and she has a fine, big room to herself—I've seen it. She doesn't know a thing about living in a houseful of brothers and sisters."

But Florence, though her eyes opened wide at some things, seemed not at all disturbed by the teasing, the merry mischief, the borrowing and the sharing that went on around her. She was exceedingly easy to entertain—ready to go down to the brook to sail boats with the little boys, ready to play tea party with the little girls, or to plan and to help with a real tea party with aunt and the older girls.

"Well, Florence, what do you think of a big family by this time?" asked the grandmother when the visit was nearly over. "Will you miss having so many around you?"

"Oh, it's the beautiful give and take of it that I shall miss," said Florence. "I never had a chance to learn that before. I've heard girls say: 'Of course you can be lovely and sweet when you can have everything by yourself,' but that i only selfish sweetness. All the little jostles and upsets and learning to give part of the road to other people, and to have them think different thoughts from yours and say so without expecting you to be hurt or cross—grandmother, they make you stronger and broader, and what sweetness you have goes deeper. It's like." Florence laughed, "like training in a mental gymnasium."

The "give and take" of daily life is indeed valuable discipline. Learning to do it good-naturedly, to take one's share honestly in the things to be done and borne, and to claim no more than one's share in the things to be enjoyed, to get rid of supersensitiveness, and not to attach undue importance to matters that are not important, is fine drill in growing strong, sensible and unselfish. We all are not alike, and however much we may like our own pattern, we cannot make others over into it. We have to take our friends as they are, and like them as we find them. We must be quick to see their good points, make allowances for their weaknesses, and never forget that they are continually called upon to do the same for us. Whoever loves us at all must needs love us around many faults and peculiarities. The help we give and the help we receive, and our whole life's comfort and usefulness, depend upon our learning these lessons of human intercourse.—Selected.

A Talk About Faithfulness.

Mary Graham.

"I gave my brother Hanani, and Hananiah the ruler of the palace, charge over Jerusalem: for he was a faithful man, and feared God above many."—Neh. 7:2.

This was a great step in the way of promotion, from being the keeper of the palace merely, to having charge of the whole city of Jerusalem.

And why was it given to this particular man?

The answer is all summed up in this one word, Faithfulness.

No doubt there were other requisites; executive ability, the power of handling the men working under him, but these were useless unless accompanied by the other.

My dear boys and girls, there are many positions not requiring talents of a high order, and open to you today if you wish to fill them. But show me the position where this one quality of faithfulness is not the first requisite. The advantage of this trait of character over many others is that it can be cultivated; it is not necessarily inborn, like brilliancy of intellect or that other much talked of quality, executive ability. We often hear the expression, "He is a born genius, or a born leader," and you may naturally wish that some time you may hear at least one of those expressions applied to yourself. Although the first mentioned does not always make a success of his life, the second is pretty sure, given a fair chance, to rise to the top, in whatever walk of life he may have chosen.

It is the sad truth that the lack of the very quality which is the subject of this paper, has proved the downfall of many of those who were seated in high places.

It is vain for you to wish for brilliancy of intellect if you were not born with it, nor to covet a position of leadership, if you lack the natural qualities which would enable you to fill it. But there is no reason why you should not be the possessor of that one trait of character, faithfulness, which is sure to help you in any position, high or low, that you may be called upon to fill.

Then make up your mind that however humble the work you may at present have to do, you will do it thoroughly and do it well, to the very best of your ability. "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much."

My Garden.

I have a little garden.
I planted lots of seeds
And watered them and watched them
And pulled up the weeds.
And now I have a pansy
And a pumpkin and a bean
And three tall hollyhocks
With leaves big and green,
And, best of all, a daisy
I found out on the hill.
I dug it up and brought it home,
And it is smiling still!

The Fight That Did Not Take Place.

The rude tests to which pupils used to put young teachers have furnished many a good story. Here is another. Ben, a young man of whom a contributor writes to the Companion, had just been graduated from college.

He took a country school to teach. The largest boy at school seemed to think that spelling was beneath his dignity and was surly and rebellious in manner. Ben for a while took no notice of the boy's rudeness, but one day he became so defiant that Ben saw the crisis had come.

"Tom, spell that word again, and spell it right," he said.

"I did spell it right."

"You know perfectly well what I mean. You spelled it correctly so far as the letters are concerned, but your manner was impertinent. You've got to spell that word again and spell it in a proper tone; otherwise you and I will go outdoors and fight. You are as big as I am, and maybe you can whip me; and if you do, of course I'll have to leave this school. But let me tell you something first. I'm poor, and I'm making my living here. I don't want to go, for I haven't money enough even to get home with. So if I fight I'll fight like a wildcat. Tom, spell that word again."

Tom spelled it in an acceptable manner, and that is why the rest of the boys missed seeing a fight.—Selected.

Sharers.

Worn lips upon His garment drank of life,
And even he who bore the Saviour's cross
Remembered is, while mighty kings of strife
Lie in forgotten tombs or idly toss
Upon the winds; the carven symbols fade
Where lichens toil the centuries away;
Alone remains immortally arrayed
The lives He touched in that dim yesterday:
So may we know His heading and His care
And in His changeless love forever share!

—Arthur W. Peach.

Mary Swail Taft, writing of life in India, has this to say about "the greatest sight in all India": It was not Mount Everest or the Taj Mahal. "It was a lone American physician, living alone in one of India's sacred cities. In Brindaban, on the Jumna, thronging with garlanded sacred cows, chattering sacred monkeys, vile priests, temple women to the number of eight thousand—a haunting nightmare of a city—she was carrying on her work. We had taken tiffin with her. Never can I forget that good-bye as she stood on the veranda of her bungalow. It seemed so impossible to leave her there, lily-faced, lily-souled, in that cesspool of iniquity, with not a single one of her own race. She answered the unspoken thought: "But these people are my people." Her life was a vow. With another she had said, "These people are my people till my God is their God." So the people call her a Sadher—a holy one—and when she lay sick unto death they hovered about the door saying, "I will not speak, only let me see her."

Another Lie Nailed.

A foreign devil—the pleasant Chinese name for all persons of another race— is a rare sight in the interior villages of China; in some he is still known only by hearsay. The European or the American traveler who first enters a remote village excites much the same interest as "the wild man of Borneo" excites in a country town here. In Travel Mr. William A. Anderson tells how the natives of a certain village in North China received him and incidentally how he was the means of dispelling a most injurious rumor about the Anglo-Saxon knee joint.

Seated upon an old millstone in a shaded corner of the yard, he says, I became the object of a good-natured inquisition by the curious farmers, who casually came to me in ones and in twos until they felt it safe to be bold. Then an old man, wrinkled like the neck of a turtle and with eyes twinkling with humor and curiosity, darted forth an inquisitive hand and pinched me with his bony fingers. Instinctly I tightened my muscle, and he emitted a long and appreciative "Ah!" I was then politely requested to rise and sit down again. The request was made with such gentle earnestness that I complied.

"Ah!" said the old man again, nodding with satisfaction. "I thought it was a lie."

"What is the meaning of that?" I asked.

"I have always been told," he explained with a depreciatory air, "that foreigners had no joints in their knees. I see now that it must be a mistake, because you can bend yours."

My willingness to enlighten them made us all friends instantly, and they advanced upon me to examine my garments, remove my sun helmet to test its weight, try the leather of my shoes by scratching them, unbutton my coat to see if I wore an undershirt, ask the price of my clothes and enter into a violent altercation as to their advantage over the native garments.

The Christian Ministry.

I pressed the button at my neighbor's door.
But when I heard no sound I turned and stood
Irresolute. If I had moved a bell,
He must have heard it. Should I rap, or go?
But in a moment more my neighbor came.
"The bell is far, and very small," he said.
"You may not catch it, for the walls between;
But rest assured, each time you push the knob,
We cannot choose but hear the bell inside."
And what they told me of my neighbor's bell
Has cheered me when I knocked at some hard heart
And caught no answer. Now and then
I poured my soul out in a hot appeal,
And had no sign from lip or hand or eye,
That he I would have saved had even heard;
And I have sighed and turned away; and then
My neighbor's words came back;
"We cannot choose
But hear inside."
And after many days
I have had answer to a word I spoke
In ears that seemed as deaf as dead man's ears.

Johnston: Departed this life on the 31st of August, 1921, MISS MARIA A. JOHNSTON, at the home of her sister, Mrs. W. H. Tinsley, in Salem, Va.

Goolrick: Entered into life eternal on the 13th of August, 1921, KEATING NELSON GOOLRICK, eldest son of Celia H. and the late William B. Goolrick, of Fredericksburg, Va.

"He is not dead, but only lieth sleeping
In the sweet refuge of his Master's breast."

"O blessed course so well and nobly run,
O crown unfading and so early won."

Tabb: Died at Gloucester, Va., Friday, September 9, CYNTHIA CLAXTON, widow of John Newstead Tabb and daughter of the late Henry Wythe and Ellen Foster Tabb, of "Auburn."

"Passed beyond all grief and pain,
Death for thee is truest gain."

Steptoe: JOHN OTEY STEPTOE, son of the late John M. and Hammie Leftwich Steptoe, of Lynchburg, died at the Buxton Hospital, Newport News, August 5, after an illness of twenty-four hours, age fifty-five.

The merciful Father spared him suffering, and he calmly and peacefully "fell asleep."

GARLAND E. FAULKNER.

Whereas, it has pleased our heavenly Father to take out of the world our brother and co-laborer, GARLAND E. FAULKNER, we the vestry bow in humble submission and take courage for the work which is before us.

Mr. Faulkner was one of the oldest members of the vestry in point of service, having been one of the little group who organized the congregation which later became Trinity Church. From the beginning his heart and soul were in the work of the church, and he gave largely of his time and his means to further its progress. It was his to know the struggles and the hopes of the little band of zealous Episcopalians back in '83 who set about to establish a church in the young town of South Boston.

His death is a severe blow to the church and the vestry; indeed to the whole community.

His mature judgment, ripening through years of experience, will be greatly missed; but joyfully and hopefully we enter into the rich heritage which he leaves us as he is lifted to the higher plane of life.

Resolved, that this expression of appreciation be given his family, and that a copy be sent to the town papers and to the Southern Churchman.

R. A. PENICK,
J. D. TUCKER,
J. C. HOWLETT,
D. H. LEWIS,
Rector.

ROBERT MOSBY PULLIAM.

Entered into life on the morning of July 26, ROBERT MOSBY, youngest son of the late Dr. Robert Mosby Pulliam, of Richmond, Va., and Emma Gold, his wife.

Educated in the public schools of his native city, he entered business at the age of fourteen. Continuing as a business man, he took up and made a great success of the general insurance business.

On the 11th of November, 1903, he was married to Ione, the eldest daughter of the late George Crutchfield. This was a union of peculiar closeness and unwaning devotion. Mutual confidence and affection deepened with the passing years.

To Robert Pulliam was given a sweetness and fineness that endeared him greatly to all with whom he came in contact; as a friend he was unfailing in loyalty and helpfulness, thoughtfulness and consideration. Charitable without ostentation, devoted to his church and faithful in his support of it. He gave willingly to every good cause.

During the last years of his life he was a continual sufferer, but no complaint was ever heard from him. He kept at his work to the end, brave, uncomplaining, enduring. His faith brightened and deepened to perfect assurance. Constantly on his lips during hours of suffering were the words of the twenty-third Psalm—and we, who loved him, know that now, guided by the Lord his Shepherd, all pain ended, he walks the "green pastures" beside the "still waters" and has entered into that haven wherein 'the angel faces smile which he had loved long since and lost awhile."

MRS. MOLLIE CAVE.

When the funeral of this noble and beloved woman was held at Madison, Va., every office, store and business establishment in the town was closed, as evidence of the esteem and affection in which all the people held her. It was an unprecedented mark of respect, one which Madison had never given save in the case of a public official.

Mrs. Cave died in her home at Madison August 29, after only a few hours of illness. The daughter of Captain George Bouton and Lucetta Nalle, his wife, she was born in Madison County July 7, 1850, and had spent practically her entire life in the county and the county seat. In 1870 she married Mr. William J. Cave, who at the time of his death in 1895 was Treasurer of the county. A widow with eight young children to educate, she assumed control of the property left her by her husband and soon made a brilliant reputation for her ability as a manager and in business. The eight children, who survive her, are: Misses Belle and Norma Cave and Mrs. James Hay, of Madison; Mrs. Lucio W. Hill, of Locust Dale, Va.; George B. and A. H. Cave, of Madison; W. W. Cave, of Pulaski City, Va., and Captain R. L. Cave, U. S. A.

Mrs. Cave's home was always the center of the best life of the community. Young people particularly loved her. Possessed of an acute sense of humor, intensely interested in everybody's happiness and having a keen understanding of human nature, she entered into the spirit of youth up to the day of her death. Pretense and affectation could not live in her presence. She saw straight into people and their problems, and, guided by that insight, enjoyed life to the full, finding happiness for herself and teaching others to find it.

She had a stern sense of duty from which she never swerved, and high ideals. And so closely did she live up to them that she made the rearing of her children and the management of her home an adornment of the community's life. With all her cares, she found time for charities and kindness. Whenever she heard of misfortune or sorrow, she went to its alleviation without waiting to be called. And on all civic and philanthropic movements, she was the first woman consulted as to their advisability before they were undertaken. Her poise, her sound judgment, her unselfish viewpoint were long a proverb throughout the county.

Mrs. Cave was all her life a devoted Episcopalian. Although living in a neighborhood where Episcopalians were few, and where, for other reasons, it was difficult to support a rector, it was due to her indefatigable efforts that, for most of the time, the Madison church had services regularly.

There was no phase of the town's life that she did not touch with an ennobling hand. There was no element of the population that did not feel the benefit of her influence. To all who knew her in her home she was the ideal Southern lady, full of good works, cultured, smiling, brave in all things, creating an atmosphere to come into which was to feel an impetus to better things. Her grave was banked high with flowers brought by those into whose lives she had carried the everlasting flowers of brighter hopes and braver hearts. Thus, we have not lost her, for she is one "Of those immortal dead who live again

In minds made better by their presence."

unique condition, the Williamsport Sun says in part:

"No one can overlook the fact that there must be a human influence operative to produce a condition of this kind, which is possibly unique in the history of the parish, if not in all religious history in Williamsport.

The influence in this case is supplied by the rector of the parish, Dr. Tyndell, who deserves the congratulations of all people of this city concerned about religious welfare and advancement.

This influence has been widely and strongly felt in this community for a number of years, but in no sense is it fraught with greater potentiality than in its leadership of five lives into a relationship with the greatest field for service open to mankind."

Personal Notes

The Bishop Coadjutor of Central New York, the Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, D. D., should be addressed at 778 Genesee Street, Utica, N. Y., Bishop Fiske having removed from Syracuse to the recently acquired Episcopal residence in Utica.

The Rev. Henry Converse Parkman, rector of the Church of the Transfiguration, Baltimore, has also taken charge of St. James' Church, Indian Head, Md. This charge includes the U. S. Naval Proving Ground.

The address of the Rev. W. M. Gamble, rector-emeritus of St. Paul's Church, Manheim, Pa., is Ross-Ray, Glen Echo P. O., Md. He is serving as assistant at St. James' Church, Washington, and begins a course of study at George Washington University.

The Rev. Francis H. Stephenson has begun his work as rector of Trinity Church, Orange, Cal., Diocese of Los Angeles.

The address of the Rev. Charles F. Carson, who recently resigned the managing editorship of The Living Church, is West Allis, Wis.

The Rev. George Vest, rector of Rivanna Parish, Columbia, has accepted the call to Grace Church, Berryville, in succession to the Rev. Malcolm S. Taylor, and will take charge October 1.

The Rev. Harry St. Clair Hathaway, rector of St. John's Church, Norristown, Pa., was elected elder-general of the Society of Mayflower Descendants at the closing session of the triennial congress held at Plymouth, Mass., September 8.

The Rev. F. W. Pratt, lately a master at the Harvard School. Los Angeles, has accepted the rectorship of St. James' Church, San Diego, Diocese of Los Angeles.

The Rev. George S. A. Moore, of Michigan, has accepted appointment as managing editor of The Living Church in succession to the Rev. Charles F. Carson, resigned. Address, 1801 Fond du Lac Avenue, Milwaukee, Wis.

The Bishop of the Diocese of Los Angeles, the Rt. Rev. J. H. Johnson, D. D., will return from Europe early in November.

The Rev. William B. Everett, Jr., of Ballston, Va., has accepted a call to Piedmont Parish, Fauquier County, and will take charge October 1, with residence at Marshall, Va.

The Rev. Edwin Jan van Etten, rector of Calvary Church, Pittsburgh, is at present making a short visit to the Holy Land, and will return about the middle of October.

The Rev. N. C. Duncan, Archdeacon of Raleigh for over two years, has resigned to accept a call to Grace Church, Morgantown, District of Asheville, and takes up his new work this month.

Miss Charlotte E. Forsyth, formerly principal of Margaret Hall, Versailles, Ky., has begun work as Superintendent of Religious Education in the Diocese of Pittsburgh. Her address is Church Rooms, 317 Jenkins Building, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Ordinations.

The Rev. Frank Lambert was ordained to the priesthood Sunday, September 11, by the Rt. Rev. John G. Murray, D. D., Bishop of Maryland, in St. James' Church, Irvington, Baltimore. The Rev. William R. Webb, rector of the church, presented the candidate, and the Rev. Canon DeVries, of Washington, was the preacher. On the Thursday previous Mr. Lambert was married to Miss Barbara Murlless, of Hartford, Conn. Mr. Lambert will take up missionary work in Mobridge, S. D.

Deaths.

The Rev. Samuel Winfield Day, curate at Grace Church, Jamaica, L. I., passed away at St. John's Hospital, Brooklyn, on September 5, after an illness of two weeks. Funeral services were held in the church on September 7 by the rector, the Rev. R. T. Homans, and the body was taken to Chicago, where interment was made in Montrose Cemetery.

Near the Heart of God.

It is impossible that a coldly intellectual religion should satisfy a normal soul. To be skilled in the subtleties and abstractions of theology is not enough. We must know God as our Friend.

The Almighty not only thinks and wills. He loves. We need to get close to His heart.

Jesus is the supreme revelation of God. The divine light shines out of His face. To know Him is to realize the Supreme Being not only as Deity, but Companion.

Marvelous tenderness dwells in the heart of our Father. "Oh! the touch of His hand on mine!" There is sor row for sin in the tear of the truly penitent, and there is rich joy also, for the throne of infinite mercy has been found.

There is no earthly experience like that of standing near the cross and looking into the face of Him Who died for us. We feel instinctively that the God of Calvary understands, having been touched with the feeling of our infirmities. At Golgotha we learn something of a divine compassion with height and depth that no man can measure.

In the quiet hour of prayer one may draw very near the great Companion. We make a mistake when we attempt to do all the talking. If we listen closely we shall hear the message of a heart of infinite love.

Sometimes it requires a life tragedy, a soul-crushing sorrow, to make us really acquainted with our Lord. In such an hour we creep up to His side and we are soothed with a comfort greater than mother-love can give.

It is near the heart of God where we gain inspiration for consecrated service. We go forth with renewed faith and courage and love to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, give friendship to the strangers, console the sick and the prisoner and lead God's wandering and lost children back into the light and the peace of the Father's house.—United Presbyterian.

Mine, for I know Thee Master, though transfigured,
Veiled as "the least of these" to reach my soul;
Mine by my grasp upon Thine Incarnation,
Feeble as one not yet made fully whole:
Mine by the long, long shadows on faith's sight,
Mine by the Touch, Beloved, in the night

Mine as my needs conceive, and I receive, Thee
Life but the emptied chalice of Thy choice;
Mine Thy baptism; 'neath Thy cross my station,
Where echoes through the years Thy prayerful voice;
Mine by the throbs life genders ere it wane,
Mine by the touch, the sovereign touch, of pain.

Mine at the dawning yet, to surely see Thee
Just at the breaking of immortal day;
Mine, face to face, it may be then to falter,
Dazed by Thine unveiled beauty with dismay;
Thine, oh Enfolding Love, revealed as such,
Mine then, to know Thee, by the remembered touch.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

No true prayers are ever lost.

The man who lives a solitary life will die a stranger to himself.

Spiritual life is not a series of isolated springs, but an ocean laving every shore.—James Hastings.

Church loyalty does not demand fighting all who disagree with us. Living so as to make others want to be Christians is the wisest course.

The world waits to hear about Him from the lips and lives of them who know Him and have authority to speak for Him.

The cross is the center of the world's history; the incarnation of Christ and the crucifixion of our Lord are the pivot around which all the events of the ages revolve.

If we have not the realized presence of Christ, nothing can bring us together; if we have it, nothing can keep us apart.—C. A. Berry.

Beloved, let us love so well our work shall still be better for our love, and still our love be sweeter for our work. —Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

Christianity also teaches that to learn to rest, not only in moments snatched from our work, but by keeping our minds free from worry and anxiety, neither caring for the morrow nor fearful of the forgiven past, is to give ourselves the opportunity of drawing on that "ample re-supply" which comes to those who do not fear to expend their energy for others. Life will throb within and through us, but our souls will be in repose.—J. A. Hadfield.

THE ABIDING GRACES

In both the old and the revised Hymnal there is a hymn by Bishop Christopher Wordsworth, which is a favorite with many, containing these lines:

"Faith will vanish into sight;
Hope be emptied in delight;
Love in heaven will shine more bright;
Therefore give us love."

In the old Hymnal, but omitted in the new, is another hymn for Septuagesima, in which the same erroneous idea is expressed:

"Here faith and hope and love
Reign in sweet bond allied;
There, when this little day is o'er,
Shall love alone abide."

Again we have in both Hymnals:

"Soon shall close thy earthly mission,
Swift shall pass thy pilgrim days;
Hope soon change to glad fruition,
Faith to sight, and prayer to praise."

This is certainly not in accord with a reasonable or scriptural conception of the future life. Can we imagine a soul entering upon a higher stage of spiritual life and a new realization of the infinite glory and blessedness of God to which it is heir, suddenly bereft of the faculty of faith in God and of hope in that progressive and unending fulfilment of life which dawns upon its apprehension?

And while this used to be a common interpretation, certainly it is contrary to the teaching of St. Paul in the passage to which all of these verses have obvious reference. "But now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; and the greatest of these is love" (1 Cor. 13:13). The Apostle has been speaking of certain "gifts" bestowed very abundantly upon the Corinthian Church for their use in witnessing to the gospel and strengthening their spiritual life; especially of that kind of faith that worked miracles, and gifts of knowledge, or apprehension of the facts of Christianity, of prophecy or preaching, and of speaking with tongues. Of these the Corinthians were very proud, but the apostle reminds them that these were but transient possessions and not essential parts of the Christian character, and were, at best, partial and temporary in their nature and operation. They and their uses would cease and pass away in the larger life and fuller vision that would come. He would have them desire and cultivate those gifts of God's Spirit which were permanent and essential elements in the Christian life and would remain with them forever—faith, hope, and especially love, the most characteristic and compelling of them all. The emphatic word in the verse quoted is "abideth"; in contrast with the "cease" and "be done away" of the preceding verses. The "now" is not temporal but logical; equivalent to "thus," "since these things are so."

Doubtless, however, the authors of the hymns mentioned had in mind some of the minor uses or operations of faith and hope in this present life rather than these graces themselves. Certainly many things which we now hope for will be immediately realized, and many things now apprehended by faith will be clearly seen, when we enter the larger life beyond the veil of flesh. But the faculty of faith and hope will not be lost, nor will they cease to be exercised. Rather will their powers then begin to be realized. The soul will still be finite; and eternity cannot be lived, nor infinitude explored, nor the fulness of the glory of God be exhausted, in an instant.

A familiar illustration may serve. Here is a boy in college. His work is hard and, at first, uncongenial. But he is animated throughout his course by certain qualities, capabilities and convictions which overcome all distaste and difficulties. Presently he leaves college with his diploma and his degree. His faith, hope and love, let us call them, have accomplished their work for him at college and have been vindicated by results. He goes out into a larger world of professional or business life with new ambitions and new responsibilities. He carries with him more than a certain amount of knowledge and a certain standing among cultivated men. The same qualities grown greater—disciplined faculties, worthy aspirations, enlarged capacities for receiving and working and living—these are the best things that college gave him and trained for him to take into his new life and put to larger uses. These "abide" when his text-books and most of what he learned out of them have been forgotten.

We should remember that every exercise of these cardinal virtues, making for their strengthening and development, adds both to our fitness for the higher life and our capacity for its enjoyment. They are permanent endowments of the renewed soul. They are immortal because the objects upon which they are fixed, as well as the Holy Spirit by whom they are inspired, are immortal.

Wisely does the Church teach us to pray, in the Collect for a recent Sunday, that God would "give unto us the increase of faith, hope and charity"; and links this aspiration with the very essentials of our religion, the love of God's will and the obtaining of His promises. And beautifully is the Collect illustrated by the story from the gospel which follows. Ten men that were lepers had faith and hope enough to cry earnestly for deliverance from their infirmity, the one need of which they were then acutely conscious, and to accept the Master's word, "Go show yourselves unto the priests," to receive official recognition of having been healed. The nine obeyed literally, and for them that was all. But one, when he saw he was healed, turned again to the Master, giving thanks and glory to God. The priests could wait, and his restoration to the society of men could wait; but this opportunity of further pouring out his heart before the Christ and gaining new revelations of His mercy and love must not wait. And Jesus was greatly pleased, and gave to this man the increase of faith and hope and love for an abiding possession of his soul.

TWO PIONEER SOUTHERN BISHOPS

On January 27, 1803, James Hervey Otey was born in Bedford County, Va., almost under the shadows of the beautiful Peaks of Otter. He was the son of a frontier farmer, doubtless of small means, and we picture his boyhood as being chiefly marked by a determination to secure an education and to make use of it; for, despite the meagre facilities which must have been at his command, by the time he had attained his majority he had graduated at the University of North Carolina and was teaching school in Tennessee. A study of the Book of Common Prayer which had fallen into his hands won his allegiance to the truth of Christ as taught by this Church, and he received the sacrament of baptism at the hands of a young North Carolina missionary, the Rev. William Mercer Green, at whose consecration as the first Bishop of Mississippi he presided more than twenty-five years later. The spiritual destitution prevailing in the State of his adoption led him to consecrate himself to the sacred ministry, and he was ordained deacon in 1825 by Bishop Ravenscroft and priest by the same Bishop in 1827, within a few months of having attained the canonical age. Returning to Tennessee, he established a school at Franklin by which he supported himself and began his missionary labors over as large a territory as he could reach, being for a time the only minister of this Church in the State. By intense study he so cultivated his robust mind and developed his natural gifts that his power as a preacher became widely recognized, while his unflagging zeal overcame difficulties which would have daunted a weaker man. When a fever laid him low he would plead in his delirium, "Let me preach to these dying sinners! Do you not see them all around me perishing for the Bread of Life?" He established congregations in Nashville, Columbia and several other points which could be reached by hard riding between school hours. Within two years he was joined by two other clergymen, one of whom, the Rev. John Davis, a deacon, had been sent by the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society on a salary of $200, their first missionary in the South. The other was the Rev. Dr. Daniel Stephens, from Virginia. These three organized the Diocese of Tennessee, which was admitted into union with the General Convention in August, 1829; there being then no canon prescribing the number of self-supporting parishes and the support guaranteed for the Episcopate which has since hampered the formation of new dioceses and militated against their self-development.

RT. REV. JAMES H. OTEY, D.D., LL.D.

At this time there was not a completed church building in the State, and the number of known communicants, judging from later reports, could hardly have numbered fifty. Bishops Ravenscroft, Meade and Ives visited the infant Diocese, ordained several deacons and administered confirmation at four or five places. By 1833 the number of clergy had increased to perhaps ten, with an equal number of organized parishes or missions, and these elected Mr. Otey as their Bishop. He was consecrated in January, 1834.

In the report of the Diocese to the General Convention in 1835 it is stated that, "By virtue of an act of the last Convention, the Bishop was enabled to dissolve his connection with the parish of which he was rector, and is now become our chief missionary. His support is derived from an assessment on the parishes." This action of Tennessee is noteworthy, since few of our early Bishops, even in the stronger dioceses, were thus relieved of the care parishes from which the greater part of their support was intended to come. Bishop Otey, however, was afterwards for a long time at least nominally rector of St. Peter's Church, Columbia, at which place had been established a flourishing female Church school. But that he was "chief missionary" at all times cannot be doubted. The Diocese boasted of "an Episcopal supervision equally affectionate and energetic," while the Bishop devoted himself to the most active labors covering the extent of the State. He was possessed not only of spiritual energy, but of a stalwart and sinewy frame fitted to endure the hardships of which he took little account. An oft-repeated story is told of him to the effect that on one occasion he was sleeping soundly in a rude tavern when a local gambler and bully entered the room and demanded possession of his bed, loudly threatening to throw its occupant out of the window unless it was vacated immediately. "All right, my friend," said the Bishop drowsily as he thrust a brawny arm from under the covers, "but before you throw me out, feel that." A glance proved sufficient, however, and he was left in undisturbed occupancy. In all his journeyings he was, of course, constantly engaged in the beloved task of preaching the gospel and in performing all the ministrations of the Church, not only as occasion offered, but as opportunity could be made, "both publicly and from house to house."

While Bishop Otey was thus being trained for his great life work the same Divine Providence was preparing for him a fellow-apostle to the Church of the fast-developing Southwest. Leonidas Polk was the scion of a prominent and wealthy family of North Carolina. Both his father and grandfather were officers in the War of the Revolution, and it was natural that a military career should appeal to him. While quite young he obtained an appointment to a cadetship at West Point, where his abilities enabled him to take a high stand. It was here that his attention was directed to the claims of religion and the Church as one of the fruits of the remarkable spiritual awakening in this institution under the chaplaincy of the Rev. Charles P. McIlvaine, afterwards Bishop of Ohio. Bishop Bedell has recorded an incident which, while familiar to some, is worth repeating here, because it illustrates both the intellectual and spiritual qualities of the future Bishop of Louisiana. It seems that Cadet Polk had been a somewhat careless student, and possibly his recent absorption in religious concerns had been allowed to interfere with his preparation for the class-room. An important examination drew near for which he found himself but poorly prepared, and he dreaded the failure which was in prospect, especially, as he confessed to the chaplain, because he feared it would discredit his recent confession of Christ in the minds of his fellow-cadets. In the course of the examination, to quote Bishop Bedell, "young Polk was called to the blackboard and a problem placed before him for solution. He was utterly at a loss. The process of reasoning required in the case seemed an utter blank. As he stood there, unable to demonstrate the problem, one can easily realize the agony of his mind. But he prayed most earnestly while he was thinking most intensely. Gradually light seemed to dawn. He began to reason in figures, and with the chalk in his hand began working towards a solution of which as yet he had no clear conception. At last he arrived at a result which seemed satisfactory. Still praying, when his turn came, as he went on explaining the process by which he had reached the result, he could see the examiners whispering to one another. With no little fear he listened to hear the verdict.

"'Mr. Polk,' said the professor in charge, 'where did you obtain that solution?'

"'Is it not right, sir?' was the reply.

"'Right?' said the professor; 'not only right, but the most beautiful demonstration ever given to the problem. It is new, sir. It does not appear in any of the books!'"

Having graduated with honors at West Point, Mr. Polk received a commission and served for a short time in the army. But his conversion had been very thorough, and feeling called to the sacred ministry, he resigned to enter the Theological Seminary in Virginia. Upon leaving that institution a fellow-student wrote to him: "I parted today with a dear brother, Leonidas Polk, who has gone to be ordained. He is a superior man and much beloved here; as holy and devoted a man as any we had. I have confidence that he will be eminently useful." He was ordained in the Monumental Church, Richmond, in April, 1830, by Bishop Moore, and served as the Bishop's assistant in that congregation for nearly two years. When forced by ill health to retire, Bishop Moore bore witness to "the spirit of the most ardent piety and devotion to duty" which had marked his short ministry in Richmond. After his return from a voyage across the Atlantic to recruit his health he took charge of St. Peter's Church, Columbia, Tenn., and soon became conspicuous among the little band which rallied around the young Bishop Otey. Only about four and a half years later, at the General Convention of 1838, he was elected by the House of Deputies, upon nomination of the Bishops, for such was the provision of the canons of that day, Missionary Bishop of Arkansas, with jurisdiction of any other parts of the United States below latitude 62½ degrees where the Church was not yet organized. He was our second Missionary Bishop, Bishop Jackson Kemper being the first, consecrated three years before with a jurisdiction over the whole Northwest beyond the limits of the organized dioceses.

Mr. Polk's consecration, the first to be held west of the Alleghanies, took place in Cincinnati on December 9 of the same year. Bishop Meade presided, assisted by Bishops Smith, of Kentucky; McIlvaine and Otey, all young Bishops of like mind. It was on this occasion that an agreement was entered into between Bishops Meade, Otey, McIlvaine and Polk to pray specially for each other every Sunday morning. Among Bishop Meade's private papers were found written prayers, the joint composition of Bishop Otey and himself, for use in compliance with this compact; and in a letter to him from Bishop Otey, written long after, the latter says: "I never fail to remember you in my prayers every Sunday morning, according to a mutual agreement of many years' standing."

While the title under which Bishop Polk was consecrated was that of Missionary Bishop of Arkansas, it was not intended that he should confine his labors to that State, but that he should be open to the call of any Southern Diocese unprovided with a Bishop, and especially of Louisiana, for his services. Before his consecration, and excepting Bishop Otey, only two Bishops had visited the far Southern dioceses. In 1830 Bishop Brownell, of Connecticut, had visited Alabama, performed Episcopal services at Mobile, Selma and Montgomery, and presided at the Primary Convention of that Diocese, which was then placed under his nominal supervision. He made also some visitations in Mississippi. Again Bishop Brownell spent the winter of 1834-35 in New Orleans, and there was present at a convention of delegates from Alabama and Mississippi and the ministers and congregations in Louisiana "for the purpose of associating and joining in the election of a Bishop," according to a plan proposed by Alabama several years before. The Rev. Dr. Francis L. Hawks was chosen Bishop by this Convention. The General Convention of 1835 sought to further this plan by electing Dr. Hawks Missionary Bishop of Louisiana, Arkansas and Florida, but he subsequently declined both elections. Bishop Brownell again spent the winter of 1836-37 in New Orleans and performed some Episcopal services. Bishop Kemper made some visitations in the lower Mississippi Valley during the triennium of 1835-38.

Bishop Polk, therefore, entered upon a large field. On his first visitation he was engaged for nearly five months and traveled about 5,000 miles through parts of the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas and the Republic of Texas. Later he made more thorough visitations of all these States and explored the Indian Territory and the northern borders of Texas, preaching at frontier towns and army posts, holding pow-wows with Indian chiefs and ministering to isolated families of Church people and to such scattered congregations as he could find. He discovered open doors at every hand, and but for lack of missionaries the Church could have entered in abundantly.

At the General Convention of 1841 Bishop Polk resigned his Missionary Jurisdiction to become Bishop of the newly organized Diocese of Louisiana. In this State, as elsewhere, he was, and remained, immensely popular. He was a handsome man of commanding presence and military bearing, of fine intelligence and charming manners—a born leader. The new Diocese quickly responded to his administration by a vigorous growth, as did Alabama, which continued under his charge.

The Missionary District of Arkansas and the Indian Territory was then placed in charge of Bishop Otey, as though he had not enough to do in Tennessee and Mississippi, of which Diocese he was now regularly in charge as Provisional Bishop. He made long and laborious journeys throughout the District and also into Texas, following up the work of his predecessor and greatly strengthening that wide field. The report of two such visitations made in a single year and occupying four months for their accomplishment was published in the Journal of the General Convention by special resolution. But flesh and blood could not endure such superabundant labors. He resigned the Missionary District in 1844, and was succeeded by the Rev. George W. Freeman, who also was to have jurisdiction over our missions in Texas.

Rt. Rev. Leonidas Polk.

Thus for a number of years Bishops Otey and Polk divided the Southwestern field of the Church between them. Bishop Otey, besides his proper Diocese of Tennessee, made many visitations in Alabama and Louisiana and until relieved by Bishop Polk, was Provisional Bishop of Mississippi from about 1836 to 1850, Missionary Bishop of Arkansas and Indian Territory, 1841-44, and Provisional Bishop of Florida for several years about 1849-51. Bishop Polk was Missionary Bishop of Arkansas and Indian Territory, and acting Bishop of Alabama and Louisiana, 1838-41, then Bishop of Louisiana, which became his permanent Diocese, Provisional Bishop of Alabama, 1841-44, with frequent visits to the churches in Texas.

Of the later life of these stalwart and devoted brother-apostles, their labors in laying the foundations, so soon to be swept away, of the University of the South, their strong influence in guiding the action of the Southern Church during the stormy days of secession and in organizing the Church in the Confederate States, we cannot speak. They passed away during the dark days of the War Between the States; Bishop Otey in April, 1863, and Bishop Polk, driven against his will by the force of inexorable circumstances and by a strong sense of painful duty to resume for the moment his old profession of arms, dying at last a soldier's death but fourteen months later.

There is a power in public worship, in the utterance of common sorrows, needs, and hopes, in the prayer that is breathed and the praise that is sung in concert, not with the crowd that fills the sanctuary, but with the innumerable company of all ages who have drunk of the same spring and gone strengthened on their way, which they strangely miss who teach that worship is a worn-out compensation, and that only in the clear light of law can men walk and be blest. While man sins and suffers, while there is blood-tinged sweat upon his brow, while there is weeping in his home and anguish in his heart, that voice can never lose its music which brings forth the comfort and inspiration of the gospel, which tells the sin-tormented spirit the tale of the infinite pity, and bids it lay its sobbing wretchedness to rest on the bosom of infinite love.—J. Gregory.

THE CHURCH TOMORROW

III

The Rev. S. S. Drury, D. D.

After this third bulletin about a conference of boys to consider the Church's ministry and to replenish it ten years hence, I promise to print not another word until there is something tangible to report. The subject has been aired long enough. A group of clergymen and laymen will meet in October to make plans. Let friendly readers, therefore, be on the watch for a statement from this committee not later than November 15. Ideas from anybody anywhere will be warmly welcomed. Our next step is to assemble a small group, who will put something definite before boys and their parents, parishes and their vestries.

An anonymous post-card arrived this morning, calling in question the sentence in my last bulletin which ran: "On one point we all agree—we need more ministers." Our critic says, referring to a Church paper, "Nine priests looking for work. Many New York curates cannot secure parishes. Why all this hysteria about August, 1922?" Though I don't object much to anonymity, that word "hysteria" is galling, for nobody likes to be hysterical, specially in the Church's business. Before we venture to repeat the assertion that "there aren't enough ministers, and we ought to raise up more," and before we make country-wide plans to increase the ministry, this ghost of unemployed clergy ought first to be laid. Figures from our seminaries and articles in the secular press seem clearly to indicate that large portions of our republic suffer from closed churches and a lack of ministers. No man who happens to be pleasantly situated in the ministry should pick flaws in his brethren, nor is there room here to debate with a truly fraternal patience why nine clergymen can't get work. That there is restlessness among certain clergymen we know well. We expect that the New York curates above referred to could readily find parishes in rural New England or in the mission field if they wanted to go there. Is it over-harsh to ask the following question: Allowing for that occasional tragedy in all professional life, where the probably good man can't get work, how many tactful, diligent and godly ministers do you know who are out of employment? Note these qualifications and the necessity of all three in one man. There are clergymen who are hard-working and good, but whose lack of tact unfits them for leadership. There are ministers who are gracious and godly, but who seem to be looking for nice easy parishes, which do not or must not exist. And there are a few men who may be tactful and diligent, but whose personal history hasn't stood scrutiny. Supposing that the clergymen who advertise for work are unable to get it, and supposing further that there is no personal disqualification, should we let that condition, sad as it may be, deter us from laying plans to raise up fresh candidates for the ministry? We must go forward with it. Our needy Christian communities call for ministration. And the less insistent sense of need of rural communities shows the depth of the need. The suggestion that no more candidates should be raised up till the last ordained clergyman is placed to suit himself is a council of despair. Difficulties normally incurred after an enterprise is started are as nothing compared to the drag of the cry, "Why start at all?"

Not in a spirit of hysteria, but with sober conviction, students of society are noting that whatever may be said about today, ten years from now surely there won't be enough ministers to go around. Other professions are full. Why not the ministry? Last night I asked a teacher of medicine if his calling was as starved for candidates as mine. "Oh, no," he replied (I am not sure of these figures). "Columbia had six hundred applicants for its first-year class in the medical school and turned more than four hundred away." Just to let some sunlight of friendly criticism in upon our calling, let me here briefly hazard two reasons why our best young men shy away from the ministry.

(a) The scope for spiritual leadership is cramped. Clergymen are forced to be good-natured routineers rather than religious guides. The minister is the people's man—his actions perhaps a proper subject for their praise or blame. But is the minister often blamed for spending quiet hours in his secreted study preparing not Sunday's sermon perhaps, but reading and delving and thinking and praying himself into that clarified state so essential to spiritual guiding? Parishioners fritter away the energy of their leader in a dozen materialistic side issues. What man wants to see himself thus gently degenerating? These time-consuming chores do not cause the clergy to grow in grace or power. And what results? With shame I say it—the clergy are not radiant advertisements of their profession. We ministers are a real barrier to the increase of the ministry. But the blame is not all ours, not nearly all. The parish is to blame. Were the modern minister expected and allowed to fulfil his ordination vows, he would be achieving an enviable and attracting career.

(b) Wrong inducements are emphasized. Why should a man become a minister? Is it not intimated that the ministry is a gentlemanly job and that certain immunities are attached to it? In vain is that kind of a net spread in the sight of any bird of spirit. Such an inducement (seldom phrased of course) is as humorously purblind as the sermon a dear old English don preached in mid-summer to the bed-makers and goodies of his college. This learned cleric discovering about him the ancient retainers of the college, arranged for them a special service in the chapel. He preached on the vocation of the ministry. Just why, nobody knew. Pointing out the charm of Greek and the delights of Hebrew, he concluded by saying: "Moreover, the ministry leads to positions of great distinction and emolument, such as bishoprics." The picture of patient rows of bed-makers considering Hebrew and bishoprics is about as sane as the picture of our young men in America contemplating the ministry because of its ease. The Church has never grown by that method. Our Lord's call was ever to adventure and sacrifice. Tell a boy that a course is fraught with danger, and it attracts him. Tell a young man that a career involves sacrifice, and he hears it calling. But tell him that it is "handsome and out of the wet," and he will not consider it. At the conference of boys next summer, which we are planning, no young man ought then and there to be allowed to sign on for the ministry. We want young men who have not made up their minds pro or con about any career. We shall ask only for a hearing. And we believe that our Church can provide a goodly number of earnest young men from sixteen to eighteen, who will gladly spend a week in considering the career of the ministry.

So, then, first for a small central committee to get the whole plan in shape, and by a certain hard-headed practicality to rob it of "hysteria." (Yes, that word from our anonymous friend has gone home and should bear fruit!) The committee will decide where to have the conference and when to have it and how to finance it. Perhaps they will let me raise the money, for we should not expect vestries or individuals to pay for more than traveling expenses and a registration fee to validate attendance. The other costs, which might include one outstanding leader from England (not a college don!), the expenses of speakers, and the board of all who attend, should, in my judgment, be free. The committee may say No. I suppose it will amount to about $5,000. If this plan has got life in it and is based on sound principle, it won't take long to persuade people to invest in such a provocative cause.

Now no more talk for two months. Just thought and prayer and visions. We are committed to a difficult undertaking. It is going to tax our energy and patience. There will be "many adversaries." And yet as Christ loved the Church, we must, as He did, by painful service love it too. Difficult it will be to promote this cause, but the necessity of it all somehow gives its very difficulties halo and wings.

The Lord of heaven and earth blended our nature with His own; He took the manhood into God; He bound us up with Himself as one invisible being; He shared not only our State, but our nature and essence; He took from us a human nature that He give us a divine. And, remember, further, that this mystery of the God and man is a mystery for everlasting. As there ever has been, and ever will be, the eternal Son of God, so will there ever remain the eternal Son of man. This blessed union is incapable of dissolution; our immortality is suspended on its continuance; we could not have life eternal unless God were to be man eternal. The first fruits will remain with the rest of the harvest in glory.—W. Archer Butler.

It is Up to Us

E. M. G.

"Us" in this case does not mean some indefinite aggregation of persons, called "us" in a sermon or lecture for euphony. It means you, and it means me, and refers directly to our responsibility to God, the Church and our children, not to mention our neighbor.

The above title headed a little editorial in the Southern Churchman not long ago, which I quote in full below:

"Are the people of this Church of ours willing to contemplate its gradual extinction? Do we want the churches closed up, and the congregations scattered, because there will be no ministers?

"If not, what are we going to do about these facts?

"In the year 1916 there were 256 students in five typical seminaries of our Church; in 1920 there were 179, a loss of 31 per cent.

"Church papers can write about this as much as they please, but the situation will not be met until fathers and mothers begin to try to pray their own boys into the ministry, and vestrymen and other Church leaders try deliberately to pick out the best boys in the congregation and bring a personal suggestion to the ministry squarely up to them.

"It is not a question any more of what we think; but of what we are going to do."

Indifference and laxity are becoming more flagrant every day, and it is not often the fault of the young people. It has been well said lately that the very men and women who have (they think) repudiated Christ, and no longer believe, still abide by the Christian principles of conduct, and standard of morals, and live according to His teachings. But their children do not! The poor cihldren have gone seldom, or not at all, to church and Sunday school, they have had to meet spiritual and personal questions, such as arise in the life of each child that passes through youth to manhood, with practically no help. As a consequence, many girls who would have made fine women are incurably frivolous, with no respect for work, marriage or motherhood. Many boys are hopelessly material, with no respect for anything but the almighty dollar and the material comforts it will buy. They treat marriage lightly. They have no religion, and frankly avow the fact on every possible occasion and some impossible ones. And we sit back and talk about the "degenerate age."

It isn't a case for talking, but for doing. There is only one thing to do. Get the boys and girls into the Church, teach them some religion, get the young people interested and into the Church before they follow the dark path trodden by so many these recent years.

Educate all the fit men we can for the ministry. Seek those boys in your parish who are loved by their fellows, solid, straight-thinking, manly boys, and don't let a lack of religion on their part stop you. Teach them the religion, and prepare them for a call. Many will feel it.

The sensitive lad with religious leanings seldom gets any encouragement these days. I lately heard the headmaster of a boys' school say to a minister's son, "You had better go into business, where you can make some money; there isn't any money in the ministry!" And that man was born and bred in the Church, and the boy to whom he spoke has all the requisites for a successful minister, a leader of men, including a gift of speech.

Each member of the Church should first look into his own heart—have you no feeling that you ought to devote some time to God, to helping the sick, and weak, and sinful, to making the world a better place to live in? Did you ever think that though charity begins at home, it ought not to stop there? Do you know that a "hard, practical business man" often makes a splendid missionary or parish worker, and can be of incalculable benefit to his overworked pastor?

Do you feel that you would enter the ministry, could you find a way? Do you know of men who cannot take the courses in Greek and Hebrew, yet who seem gifted men, and leaders, and spiritual guides?

There is a school for such men. It is a new thing, organized to meet the great need for men, planned to develop men for the rural districts, for the small towns, for all parishes in need of ministers or helpers. The course is in no way made too light. Nealy all the Bishops in the American Church endorse it in glowing terms. All the deans of theological seminaries do, for it at once takes off their shoulders the burden of "irregular" students, and gives such men a chance to get their fundamentals in a school planned for the purpose, and later to go on and take the seminary course, if they desire. The school is at Monteagle, Tenn. It is called, in memory of one of the leaders of the American Church, the DuBose Memorial Church Training School. Ask your minister, or your Bishop.

A Recollection of the Rev. Dr. John Kershaw

J. D. E.

It was during the Christmas holidays of 1920 that I last saw Dr. Kershaw. The occasion was a casual stop of a day in Charleston on my return from a hunting trip in the "low country" of South Carolina. I had not seen him for several years, and welcomed the opportunity for meeting again, even for a little while, the venerable friend of my youth and early manhood. I say friend of my youth because, though he was a "gray-head" when I first remember him, and that was while he was still in Sumter, before the death of Dr. Trapier left the pulpit of St. Michael's open to which he was called, he was even then my friend. Never was there any one who had a sweeter gift for friendship! It radiated from his kindly, manly face with that luminousness that seemed to glow about the heads of the early saints. Among the most precious things in life are its inherited friendships. Dr. Kershaw's father, General Joseph B. Kershaw, of the Confederate Army, had been the friend of my father through the four long years of the great strife. He had continued so through the dark days of Reconstruction. As a cadet soldier of the last year of the war, John Kershaw had been my father's friend, and afterward, when the young warrior for the South had put on the armor and became a soldier in Christ's ministry, the friendship had passed on to me in my generation.

On that bright December day when I saw him last I had wandered alone through the old tombstones of St. Michael's Church-yard to the rector's study, and to my rap at the door came the cheery summons to come in. The never-failing smile and warm greeting made me welcome. He was seated at his desk writing, and I discovered that I had arrested him in his labors at the revision of Dalcho's History of the Church in South Carolina. It was a congenial but an onerous task to which he gave the devoted labors of his last years. Whether he was spared to finish them I have never learned. The scope of his work was merely to bring the old history down to date. He had been elected to the task, as he told me, by the Diocesan Council. I asked him if the work would bear any analogy to the monumental volumes of Judge O'Neill in his Bench and Bar of South Carolina, but he said that such would be beyond his strength which he felt was hardly up to the demands of his present effort. My rejoinder was that the happy solution would be for him to postpone such a plan until the time of his retirement from the active work of his parish, when as rector-emeritus he might dedicate his declining years to a task for which no one in the Diocese was so well fitted, by natural gifts or long associations, as he. There was some pleasant rejoinder, but the intimation that he was already beyond such a purpose. Then he told me that that day was his seventh-fourth birthday and the anniversary of his twenty-fifth year as rector of St. Michael's. It was easy to see that through his mind there were passing in review many of the experiences, some of the sorrows, many of the joys of that long life and service. He had seen much of life, had known some of its most poignant griefs, must have known many of its most precious blessings. Few men had been more beloved or had loved more unselfishly. The recollection of my half-hour with him has been a beautiful memory to me. The news of his death but a few months after could not fail to bring me pain.

I cannot refrain from reciting an incident which illustrates the character of the man—a character that made such an impress upon all those who knew him. I happened myself to be in deep distress. Like David, I felt "all thy waves and thy billows have gone over me." But "deep calleth unto deep," and answering the depth of my trouble came, uncalled, this man of God to comfort and support. To the dispairing reply which I made to his suggestion that I take my grief to God in prayer—"of what use can that be?"—he gently answered, "My son, it will bring you closer to God and you will learn to understand." It was but a flash in the darkness then, like a light across troubled waters, but it has, with passing years, become a beacon set on the rocks and marks a haven where I have found rest and security from many storms.

St. Paul tells us, in a few words, the qualities which ought to adorn old age—sobriety, gravity, temperance, wisdom. The old should be known among us for these things. They should be examples and guides to youth in the ways and works of godliness. To them we should look for counsel, for advice, for help, in the practice of a Christian life. Above all, they should be examples of piety, of reverent respect for all God's holy ordinances.—R. D. B. Rawnsley.

A CENTENARY HYMN.

To Commemorate the First Century of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The Rev. Edward Henry Eckell.

Let myriad throats of pipe and voice
Lift up their anthems and rejoice,
Our years of missionary zeal
With solemn thankfulness to seal:
Accept, O Lord, the fruits we bring,
Nor scorn our humble offering.

Praise for the Church's pioneers,
Who sowed with mingled hopes and fears;
Praise for devoted woman's aid,
In sacrificial service paid:
Accept, O Lord, the fruits we bring,
Nor scorn our humble offering.

Praise for the strife of godly youth
To spread abroad Thy saving truth;
Praise for the piety at home
That prayed in faith, "Thy Kingdom come":
Accept, O Lord, the fruits we bring,
Nor scorn our humble offering.

Praise for official guidance wise
By laymen given the great surprise;
And children's gifts at Easter-tide,
A proof of self in Lent denied:
Accept, O Lord, the fruits we bring,
Nor scorn our humble offering.

Not yet to Thee all life is won,
Nor shines the cross 'neath every sun;
The task for us and ours is set—
Help, Lord, and be the challenge met:
Accept, O Lord, the fruits we bring,
Nor scorn our humble offering.

To Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,
Adored, obeyed, from coast to coast,
Let myriad throats of pipe and voice
Lift up their anthems and rejoice:
Accept, O Lord, the fruits we bring,
Nor scorn our humble offering. Amen.

Bishop Garrett's Early Days in Northern Texas

Confidence men from the East caused pioneer Texans to be wary of the well-dressed stranger who called upon them, which probably accounts for the embarrassing situations in which Bishop Alexander C. Garrett found himself during the early years of his work in the Diocese of Dallas. He arrived in Dallas during the last week of December, 1874, and began his work as Bishop of Northern Texas for the Episcopal Church.

From 1859 until 1873 Bishop Gregg was Bishop of the Diocese of Texas, but the field was so large and the population had grown to such an extent that it became necessary to appoint two new bishops. In Northern Texas there were 100,000 square miles, and according to popular belief, a population of more than 600,000 persons. In the census of 1880 it was found that there was a population of only 232,000 persons. The people of New York City, who had obtained the appointment of Bishop Garrett, were "very much exercised over this fact and demanded an explanation as to what disposal had been made of the other 400,000 persons," Bishop Garrett said.

The Rev. Silas Davenport was rector of St. Matthew's Cathedral, which was located at Elm and Lamar Streets, when Bishop Garrett arrived in the city. Dallas had a population of between 3,000 and 4,000 persons. Fort Worth claimed 1,500 and Weatherford had nearly 1,000 persons.

On his first trip to McKinney, Bishop Garrett said he was warmly received by a banker who met him at the train. He was taken to the banker's home, and on being shown to his room the banker bade him good-night, and, as he went out, locked the door. The banker was back early in the morning to unlock the door and to call Bishop Garrett to breakfast, and was extremely courteous. Services were held that day and the banker placed the Bishop on his train for Dallas. It was forty years after this occurrence before Bishop Garrett knew that the banker had thought him a confidence man from the East, with his long coat and cultured manners, and had locked the door on his guest to preclude any attempt on his part to get money or silver from the house during the night.

A condemned building was the first meeting place at Ennis. A rug was furnished by one citizen, a large box was placed in the building by another, and services were conducted in this improvised church.

A reception was tendered the Bishop on his first visit to Paris. The new rectory was the scene of the celebration. The building was a log cabin with two rooms which were separated by a narrow hall. In was first built for a blacksmith shop and later was used as a saloon. Its final use was as a "rectory."

"I was in one room," Bishop Garrett said, "and I became aware of a great deal of excitement in the other room. Presently a dignified man came through the door with a black bottle in one hand and a glass in the other. He offered a sip to all around him, and most of those present accepted the offer. I, however, refused on the grounds that I was an abstainer and had been so all my life. I thought it was a novel method of receiving the Bishop.

My bed had been placed near the fireplace to make sure that I would keep warm during the night. The chimney had sunk and leaned about five inches away from the roof. In the crevice a large amount of soot had collected. During the night a wind came up, and when I presented myself the next morning my hosts could not have told me from a negro."

A singular fact with regard to the church building at Paris is that he laid the cornerstone and preached the first sermon and last sermon in the building, which was burned several years ago. He preached at the morning service on Sunday and no evening services were held. The building was burned the following Tuesday.

In the early days Paris was the leading town of North Texas, and a visit there was considered a notable event.

In the early days of Bishop Garrett's work in Northern Texas there were only five clergy and one Bishop to care for the communicants in the 100,000 square miles.

Bishop Garrett will be eighty-eight years old in November, and will celebrate the forty-sixth anniversary of his service as Bishop of Dallas early in January. In Episcopal seniority he ranks next to Bishop Tuttle.

The Great Commission.

AN IMPORTANT CONFERENCE.

The first meeting of the International Missionary Committee, representing the missionary boards and societies of all home base lands, will be held at Lake Mohonk, September 30 to October 6. Sitting with the members from North America, Europe, Australasia and South Africa will be one missionary and two nationals from India, China and Japan respectively, these being the mission countries in which there are federated national Christian councils in position to appoint member-delegates.

The World Missionary Conference, held at Edinburgh in 1910, appointed a Continuation Committee, one of whose duties was to bring about the constituting of an international committee when that should become practicable. Because of the world war the Continuation Committee of the Edinburgh Missionary Conference necessarily became quiescent, and with the coming of peace the time seemed favorable for the establishment of such an international committee as had been contemplated at Edinburgh. A preliminary international gathering looking to this end was held in the summer of 1920 at Crans, Switzerland, and in pursuance of plans then projected the International Missionary Committee soon to meet at Lake Mohonk was constituted during the last year. The Edinburgh Continuation Committee was chosen in the first instance by the World Missionary Conference, and was self-perpetuating. The International Missionary Committee is composed of members chosen by the national federative missionary organizations, those for North America, for instance, being elected last January by the Foreign Missions Conference held at Garden City, L. I., and representing the mission boards and societies of North America.

Among the topics to be considered at Lake Mohonk are the following: "The Relations of Foreign Missionary Organizations With the Church in the Mission Field"; "The Relations of Mission Boards and Missionaries to Public Questions"; "The Present Crisis in Christian Education in the Mission Field"; "The Present Situation in Regard to Christian Literature in the Mission Field"; "International Missionary Co-operation: Its Possibilities, Limitations and Problems"; "The Call and Preparation of Missionaries in the Light of the Present Situation"; "Missionary Freedom and Government Regulation of Missionary Work"; "The Present Position of German Missions"; "Communications From Mission Boards With Reference to (a) the Missionary Situation in the Far East, (b) Conditions in Portuguese Africa."

The meeting will be presided over by the committee's chairman, Dr. John R. Mott, of New York City, while Mr. J. H. Oldham, editor of the International Review of Missions, and Dr. A. L. Warnshuis, are the secretaries. The office headquarters of the committee are in London. Among the notable delegates from abroad to be present are Bishop King, Secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel of the Church of England; Sir Robert Williams, President of the Church Missionary Society of Great Britain; Dr. J. H. Ritson, Secretary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, London; Count Moltke, Denmark; Baron von Doetzelaer, Holland; Professor J. du Plessis, Stellenbosch, Union of South Africa; Dr. Karl Fries, Stockholm, Sweden; Bishop Uzaki, of the Japan Methodist Church; Dr. S. K. Datta, National Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. in India.

The North American members are the following: Mrs. William Boyd, Philadelphia, Pa.; Miss Belle H. Bennett, Nashville, Tenn.; Rev. Arthur J. Brown, D. D., New York City; Rev. William I. Chamberlain, D. D., New York City; Rev. S. H. Chester, D. D., Nashville, Tenn.; Rev. Stephen J. Corey, D. D., St. Louis, Mo.; Rev. James Endicott, D. D., Toronto, Ont.; Rev. J. H. Franklin, D. D., New York City; Principal Alfred Gandier, Toronto, Ont.; Rev. Canon S. Gould, M. D., Toronto, Ont.; President W. D. Mackenzie, D. D., Hartford, Conn.; John R. Mott, LL. D., New York City; Rev. Frank Mason North, D. D., New York City; Rev. C. H. Patton, D. D., Boston, Mass.; Mrs. Henry W. Peabody, Beverly, Mass.; Hon. N. W. Rowell, K. C., Toronto, Ont.; Rev. Paul de Schweinitz, D. D., Bethlehem, Pa.; Fennell P. Turner, New York City: Rev. Luther B. Wolf, D. D., Baltimore, Md.; John W. Wood, LL. D., New York City.

The Missionary Centennial Poster, prepared under the direction of the Department of Publicity, is off the press and is being delivered to clergy throughout the country for display in churches and parish houses. Two copies have been mailed to bishops and parochial clergy, while bulk shipments are being sent to diocesan headquarters for distribution to those parishes and missions without resident rectors.

The poster is a reproduction in colors of the Missionary Centennial seal which was designed by Mr. Hobart B. Upjohn, of New York City, the poster itself being the work of Mr. T. Leslie Thrasher, also of New York City.

RECTORS IN FACT AND FICTION.

Mr. Editor: "Hepsey Burke" is the title of a recent book by F. N. Westcott, a brother of the author of "David Harum." Hepsey is a sister to David Harum. The story has to do with the life of the new rector in a country parish in New York State—the home of the original David Harum. Donald Maxwell is the young rector, and Sylvester Bascom is the senior warden of the church.

The book is written in a humorous vein, but has a serious lesson, in that it sets forth as fiction a combination of parochial happenings, often reproduced in actual life to the hurt of the Church, the shame of certain high-handed officials and vestrymen, and the injury of the usefulness of the rector; to say nothing of the injury which his feelings and his pride often suffer, together with those of his family.

It is because the autocratic and unchristian conduct of Sylvester Bascom, no less than the other matters that harass the soul of the Rev. Donald Maxwell, are not mere figments of a novelist's imagination, but have their counterparts in many a parish in real life, that this paper is written. The usefulness of many a hard-working rector and the very life of many a church has been marred for years by such men as Sylvester Bascom and such women as his daughter Virginia and Mrs. Roscoe Jones. In the interest of art and good taste the author ends the book happily, as the ugly traits of both warden and women are finally straightened out. In real life it is by no means always so, for these characters usually persist even unto death—and their spirit seems to haunt the Church long after they have departed.

Maxwell goes from the city to a village. He is greeted with this from the senior warden, "So you are the young man who is to take charge of the church. It is always difficult for a city-bred man to adjust himself to the needs and manners of a country parish. Very difficult, Mr. Maxwell; very difficult"! This is a good example of how not to welcome a rector. Cold water is good in its place, and the proverbial wet blanket may have its function somewhere in the realm of the useful, but that's another story. Fact is, the senior warden was not deferred to by the bishop in Maxwell's appointment to the mission, nor did Maxwell go daily or weekly to receive his orders from that dignitary, hence the latter's opposition as developed in the story.

Now, the word "rector" comes from the Latin, rego-rectus, to rule; but the average vestry either does not know its Latin or else imagines that the rector will be content to rule by proxy, every several vestryman being said proxy. In a number of cases there are vestrymen on hand to make an already hard road harder for the rector, and in hundreds of cases there is at least one, as in Hepsey Burke, who is a self-constituted lay pope, and not only makes things hot for the rector, but even mars and hurts the body of Christ, which is His Church. And unlike the story, in which Hepsey undertakes to reveal to the senior warden his true self in all its ugliness, there is usually no one in the parish in real life who has the temerity to call white white and black black to said warden's face! (It need not always be the senior warden, be it said, who makes the trouble.) It is a rare body of from three to twelve members that has not at least one or two unspiritual, unscrupulous souls bent on marring the harmony of the church. Too long has the Church press and too long have the authorities ignored these busy-bodies and allowed them to continue in office without censure, ridicule or even mere mention!

Maxwell, the rector, is forced out of the rectory, goes without his salary, and finally has to take up manual labor in order to make ends meet. The reader exclaims, "O, that is extreme! Nothing like that is ever allowed really to happen!" More's the pity, it does happen. The writer has known it to happen that clergymen have been ejected and their salary withheld, not for any real fault of the rector, but on account of the venom and ill-will of one or two or more vestrymen. If the Church papers would publish these facts, both Church and ministry would profit by it. But read "Hepsey Burke" and emulate her fine character.

CONCERNING THE FEDERAL COUNCIL.

Mr. Editor: Your editorial in the issue of September 17 concerning the Federal Council is so gratifying that I cannot refrain from sending you a note of appreciation. It is heartening to know that we have such moral support, even if it does not result in immediate financial returns.

SAMUEL McCREA CAVERT,
Secretary Federal Council of the Churches of Christ.
New York.

Mr. Editor: I am very glad to see your admirable editorial for September 17 about our obligation to the Federal Council, and I hope the General Convention will take your advice and help share the load.

I have had the advantage of being a member of the Federal Council for several years, and have been greatly impressed with the value of its work. Like every human organization, it has its weak sides, but on the whole I think it is very valuable and the election of Dr. Robert Speer as President has been a great step forward.

SERVICES OF PRAYER FOR DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE: A SUGGESTION.

Mr. Editor: We should like to make the suggestion through your columns that on November 11, the opening day of the Conference on Disarmament, our churches hold special services of prayer and thanksgiving for the Conference. The delegates need our prayers. To Christians who look forward to the coming of the Kingdom of God here on earth, this Conference is one of the most momentous and one of the most critical events in the history of the world. Surely on this day Christians will meet together for corporate prayer. That they will do so seems so obvious that we hesitate even to write suggesting it.

We need strong men—Elijah-like, John-the-Baptist-like men in these "perilous times," and spiritual strength is incomparably the strongest, the most celestial, the most Christly of all strength.—A. B. Grosart.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor.

GOOD NEWS.

One form of social service work engaged in by St. Paul's Church, Augusta, Ga. (the Rev. G. Sherwood Whitney, rector), is providing entertainments for the University Hospital. Fifty societies of the city form the Hospital Auxiliary, each taking a week, known as "Service Week." The Woman's Auxiliary and the Bishop Elliott Society, the latter being the pioneers of this work at the hospital, during their week gave three entertainments, the first a reception to the nurses of both the University Hospital and the Government Hospital at Lenwood, at the home of one of St. Paul's parishioners on the Hill; the second serving ice cream to the patients in two wings of the University Hospital, and the third giving an automobile ride to the convalescent patients. Previous to this the men at the Lenwood Hospital were given an ice cream and cake party by St. Paul's Auxiliary, and in addition to this a committee goes once a week for a month, alternating at the two hospitals to sew for the wards.

The above item came in our news contributions this week. Not only is it "news," but it is such good news that we have stolen it for our page, because it is just in our line.

Nothing brings so much Christianity into the community as Church work of this character.

It is difficult to estimate the value of a church in a town that makes activities of this nature a part of its regular work.

A prayer or a sermon will appeal to a few hospital patients, but a saucer of ice cream will appeal to all except the critically ill, and an automobile drive is something that every convalescent will enjoy.

The reception for the nurses, too, is a splendid feature of this kind of work. Many of the young women in training are away from home, some, perhaps, for the first time, and are lonely, literally hungry for friends, the making of the right kind of acquaintances is a difficult matter, and often one of vital importance.

The example of St. Paul's Church, Augusta, can well be followed by our churches all over the country. In the larger places where there are several churches, and a corresponding number of hospitals and other institutions, such work can be divided by the formation of committees on co-operation, so as to prevent over-lapping, and bring about efficiency.

Nobody who is not familiar with institution life can realize what it means to have the interest of outside people, both for the sake of the inmates and of the workers. Often nothing is more acceptable than some form of addition to the menu, fruit, ice cream, or even home-cooked cake or pies mean more than we have any idea of, and the church that takes this sort of intelligent interest in those within our institutions is never forgotten by the ones who benefit thereby.

READJUSTING.

"There is an English church where a box hangs in the porch. It is used for communications for the pastor. Cranks put their notes in it, but occasionally it does fulfil its purpose. Recently the minister preached, by request, a sermon on "Recognition of Friends in Heaven," and during the week the following note was found in the box: "Dear Sir.—I should be much obliged if you could make it convenient to preach to your congregation on 'The Recognition of Friends on Earth,' as I have been coming to your church for nearly six months, and nobody has taken any notice of me yet."—Christian Register.

We quote the foregoing this week, because it is the time of year when churches are starting off again after their summer vacations.

In the autumn there are many readjustments. Either September 1 or October 1 is "moving day" in our cities. Moving their homes with some people means moving their church affiliation, so that at this season there are more strangers in our churches than at any other, and now is the time to concentrate on the practice of Christian cordiality.

The "coldness" of our churches toward strangers is almost proverbial. The clipping above quoted is probably only one of many instances of a similar character that might be cited.

Whose fault is it? And how can it be corrected?

It is only occasionally that the rector is to blame directly, for usually our clergy are glad to greet strangers and welcome them to their flock, if they know they are strangers and get an opportunity to speak to them. But generally people who come to a church for the first time sit very far back and slip out among the first to leave, so that it would take a very active clergyman to get to the front door in time to speak to them.

It is more often the fault of the strangers themselves. If they want to become a part of the parish, and have a share in the work of the church which they are attending, it is an easy thing for them to take the trouble to say so, and to wait a few minutes at the church door and tell the rector so.

But there is perhaps quite a large contingent who drop in at a church without any fixed intention of regular attendance, and the attitude of the congregation toward them will determine them as to whether or not they wish to become regular attendants or not.

Some may think that persons whose church interest is so slight as to depend on a cordial welcome are not worth cultivating anyway, but surely it is a very important thing to get such people interested and aroused to become active and not acquiescent church-goers and workers.

Yet, as we have said, it is almost impossible for the rector to beat them to the front door, so what is to be done? It is, properly speaking, the business of the vestry to assist the rector to do this very sort of work. It seems to be a general opinion that the duties of a vestry are almost entirely of temporal nature, but according to the Virginia canons (and we presume that there is something similar in every diocese), "it is the duty of the vestry to determine upon and elect a rector; to co-operate with him in promoting the spiritual welfare of his cure; to use all earnestness in seeking with him to enlist new disciples for the congregation of Christ."

One or two vestrymen can always sit as far back in the church as the strangers do, and with a little "earnestness" can get to the church door as promptly with a cordial greeting. Of course, it takes a little real Christian spirit to inspire enough activity of body and largeness of heart to do this. If every vestry had a committee on hospitality or cordiality, so that it would be somebody's business to greet strangers, finding out their addresses, church leanings, and so forth.

In conclusion, let us say a word to the strangers themselves. If you are interested in your church, or in the church in which you find yourself, don't wait for people to invite you into its activities, but volunteer. No rector or vestry committee can tell by your looks whether or not you want to do church work, so don't leave it all to their intuition.

The Church, founded by the Lord Jesus Christ and carried forward by His apostles through all the centuries, was established for the extension of His Kingdom throughout the entire world. It is the divine society for holding in prominence the great central fact and reality of the living Christ, His superhuman power in the conversion and complete transformation of men, and His right to lordship over all individuals, communities and nations throughout the wide world in the whole range of their life now and evermore. The Church is in reality the root and the trunk; every other beneficent agency and influence are but the outgrowth, the flowering and the fruitage of this great center of vitality.

If I were asked which I would wish to see planted first in any community, a Christian Church, or a Young Men's Christian Association, or a school, or a hospital, I would say with deep conviction, the Christian Church, because that would make possible and certain the ultimate and, perchance, the early establishment of all these other manifestations of the spirit of Jesus, of the application of His principles, and the communicating of His super-human power.—John R. Mott.

Church Intelligence

Still Another Decrease.

August shows another decrease in receipts on account of the Nation-Wide Campaign. The decrease for the month is only $2,165.76, but it brings the decreases of the last three months up to $192,887.35, and leaves our receipts to September 1 $2,300.86 below amount received in the corresponding period last year.

The Council, in making its appropriations, counted on an increase for the year of $200,000, and practically this entire increase was realized in the first five months. Now it is gone! Another $100,000 borrowed to carry on the work through August! We are now wondering if the missionaries' salaries can be paid at the end of this month.

Help, or Millions Die.

There is famine in Russia—one of the most appalling tragedies of want known to history.

According to official reports, thirty-five million people are threatened with early starvation.

Out of this tragic misery twenty-five million women and children cry for bread.

We appeal to you to help us save these suffering millions.

Owing to our work of distribution in Russia being carried on through the American Friends' Service Committee—a non-political, non-sectarian and non-racial force of humanitarian workers already on the ground and actively engaged in relief service—we are in position to make your gift render quick and effective aid.

Do not wait. Hunger cannot wait. Send your contribution today.

(In order to find out whether this appeal involved any duplication of effort with the American Relief Administration headed by Mr. Herbert Hoover, we wrote to Mr. Hoover, and received the following reply.—Ed. S. C.)

"Your letter of September 19 to Mr. Hoover has been referred to this office for answer.

The American Relief for Russian Women and Children is an organization which is collecting funds for the American Friends' Service Committee (Quakers) for distribution of supplies in Russia. The Friends and the American Relief Administration are working in closest possible co-ordination in relief of Russia, and with the utmost harmony. They are both, as perhaps you know, members of the European Relief Council. The Quakers are making a public appeal for funds to enable them to continue and expand their work in Russia. Any assistance that can be rendered them will be aiding the most worthy cause that we now know of in foreign relief. We understand from the headquarters of the Quakers that this committee in Chicago is turning all funds over to them, and that it is an entirely praiseworthy and able organization.

Council of Advice, Department of Christian Social Service.

At the meeting of the National Conference of Social Service Workers of the Episcopal Church held in Milwaukee in June, a resolution was passed asking me, as Executive Secretary, to appoint a Council of Advice.

In compliance with this resolution, I have made the following appointments:

The Rev. Charles K. Gilbert, Secretary of the Social Service Commission of the Diocese of New York, 416 Lafayette Street, New York City.

The Rev. Robert P. Kreitler, rector of St. Luke's Church, 706 Jefferson Avenue, Scranton, Pa.

The Rev. Charles L. Street, Cathedral of Sts. Peter and Paul, 117 North Peoria Street, Chicago, Ill.

The Rev. Rufus D. S. Putney, rector of St. Philip's Church, Union and Maple Avenues, St. Louis, Mo.

The Rev. Raimundo De Ovies, rector of Trinity Church, Galveston, Tex.

The Rev. C. Rankin Barnes, rector of St. James' Church, 1205 Fremont Avenue, South Pasadena, Cal.

The Rev. William T. Renison, rector of St. John's Church, Stockton, Cal.

The list is by no means complete, and the team work we look forward to only beginning to be developed. It seems wise, however, to publish this incomplete list immediately, in order that the commissions and those interested may know where to turn for speakers and for counsel.

This Council of Advice will represent the department, will be in close touch with it, and can speak with authority of its plans and policies. On the other hand, it is hoped that the members of the Council will help in keeping the department in close touch with the field. They will welcome any suggestions or criticisms.

The Rev. William T. Renison represented the department at the Synod of the Eighth Province ;the Rev. C. Rankin Barnes will represent the department at the Synod of the Sixth Province; the Rev. R. D. S. Putney will represent the department at the Synod of the Seventh Province: the Rev. Charles L. Street will represent the department at the Synod of the Fifth Province; the Rev. Robert P. Kreitler at the Synod of the Third Province; the Rev. Charles K. Gilbert at the Synod of the Second Province.

Charles N. Lathrop,
Executive Secretary, Department of Christian Social Service.

The 100 Per Cent. Use of a Fund.

About the first of July the American Church Building Fund Commission reached a turning point in its history. For many years it has been able to supply the Church's demand for loans from its Permanent Fund. This fund, now totaling $672,707.41, has been paid out or pledged in loans to the Church, which potentially, therefore, has a 100 per cent. use of the same. In the future loans can, therefore, be promised only as payments are received from outstanding loans, and the fund will thus become purely a revolving fund limited to actual receipts. While the Church was attaining the full use of this fund a larger number of loans could yearly be granted than will again be possible until the Permanent Fund is enlarged by gifts, offerings and legacies of the Church. The demand for assistance in church building has never heretofore exceeded the commission's ability to help, but the time has now arrived when it might be well to recall that the original plan contemplated a fund of $1,000,000—a goal which the Church's multiplying needs in the erection of churches, rectories and parish houses render most desirable of realization. The commission is endeavoring to awaken interest in such an achievement by the wide distribution of an illustrated circular lately issued.

The last of the loans granted between the May meeting of the Board and July 1 amounted to $20,300. Grants and gifts made since the May meeting have totaled $13,050 given to sixteen dioceses.

The Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City, would be glad to supply literature to all who are interested in the increase of the Commission's Permanent Fund.

Birmingham Churches to Present Missionary Pageant.

The thirty-third annual convention of the Woman's Auxiliary in the Diocese of Alabama will be held November 1 to 3 at the Church of the Advent, Birmingham. The Birmingham churches will unite to present on a large scale at one of the evening sessions of the convention the Missionary Centennial pageant, "The Mission of the Church." The three speaking parts, the "Voice of Divine Mediation," the "Appeal of the Human Spirit," and the "Word of God," will be taken by the Rev. Middleton S. Barnwell, rector of the Church of the Advent; the Rev. Joseph T. Ware, rector of St. Andrew's Church, and the Rev. Oscar DeW. Randolph, rector of St. Mary's Church, respectively. The two missionary clergymen will be represented by the Rev. Edmunds Bennett and the Rev. Carl Henckell. Mrs. Joseph T. Ware, the general chairman and director of the pageant, is being most ably and enthusiastically assisted by chairmen representing the five Birmingham churches and the new mission at East Lake. There will be more than a hundred characters representing the various mission fields and nations. The choirs of the churches will unite in furnishing the pageant music.

PITTSBURGH

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. George W. Lamb Leaves for New Field.

The Diocese has met with a serious loss in the departure to the Diocese of Pennsylvania of the Rev. George Woodward Lamb, for eighteen years connected with the Diocese, serving at the St. Mary Memorial, Pittsburgh; St. Luke's, Georgetown; Trinity, Rochester; Advent, Jeannette, and St. Andrew's, Pittsburgh. Since 1916 he has been the efficient secretary of the convention, and has held other positions of prominence in the Diocese, alternate deputy to the General Convention, and member of the Committee on Canons and of the Diocesan Historical Society.

His address is Church of the Advent, Hatboro, Pa.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

The Woman's Auxiliary.

The annual meeting of the Virginia Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary will be held in the Monumental Church, Richmond, Va., on Wednesday and Thursday, November 2 and 3. Delegates will please send their names to the Chairman of Hospitality, Miss Kate F. Meade, 406 Seminary Avenue, Richmond, Va.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor.

Dedication of the Bishop Randolph Memorial Reredos at St. Paul's Church, Suffolk.

On Sunday morning, September 25, in the presence of a large congregation, several members of the late Bishop Randolph's family being in attendance, Bishop Tucker dedicated the handsome memorial reredos presented by the Randolph Society of St. Paul's Church, Suffolk (the Rev. John F. Coleman, rector).

The reredos consists of a canvas contained in beautiful oak paneling, the central figure representing Christ the Teacher. The figure of our Lord stands among the lilies, while above His head two angels are hovering. On His right in another panel stands a human figure with arms outstretched and eyes expectant, representing the Old Testament Dispensation, while upon His left stands another human figure, with arms folded and eyes shining with the peace and contentment that the Christ had brought to the world, representing the New Dispensation, both together setting forth expectation and fulfilment. Above these figures also hover two angelic forms, showing that the ministry of angels covers both periods as it did the life and ministry of Jesus.

In addition to the canvas, the paneling was extended the entire length of the sanctuary wall, and a credence table and alms bracket placed on either side of the Lord's table.

In the panel near the Bishop's chair is carved the following inscription:

"To the glory of God and in loving memory of the Rt. Rev. Alfred Magill Randolph, D. D., D. C. L., LL. D. First Bishop of Southern Virginia. Born August 31, 1836; died April 6, 1918 This reredos is presented by the Randolph Society of St. Paul's Church."

The Randolph Society was formed on September 2, 1890, and is therefore older than the Diocese itself. It was named for the late Bishop, whose interest in and sympathy with its aims and objects continued unfailing, and among its greatest treasures is an autographed photograph presented by the Bishop himself.

Diocese Takes Over Home for Girls.

On September 22 the Executive Committee of Southern Virginia made the Episcopal Home for Girls a Diocesan Home. This was done at the urgent request of the trustees, who agree to put the Home under the complete control of the Diocese. But the Diocese is not at present able to render the financial aid needed for changes and improvements. The Home began with the Nation-Wide Campaign in Greensville. Mr. and Mrs. George W. Feild have since given Walnut Grove, with seventy acres of land. The matron, Miss Edith M. Gage, "put herself on the plate" for the Home in the Nation-Wide Campaign, and this excellent work is being done in the rectory of Meherrin Parish. The Rev. Norman F. Marshall is also throwing his old-time energy, known to many, into the work of caring for these little girls. It is planned to run a small Home, but it is hoped to provide accommodations for many more than the present eight children now in the Home. Little more can be done, however, until changes have been made in the building. Mr. Marshall, who is rector of both Meherrin and of Emporia Parishes, in Greenesville County, lives at Emporia. The Home is near Purdy, but the post-office address is R. F. D. 1, Jarratt, Va. All who visit the place are struck with the happy effects of the place on the inmates.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

The Rev. Robert C. Jett D. D. Bishop.

The meeting of the Executive Board of the Diocese, which was held in Roanoke on September 13, was devoted largely to the consideration of work that is being planned and carried out in the development of mission stations and mountain work. Both clerical and lay workers are being placed in the mountain districts and provided, whenever possible, with "Diocesan Fords," which enable them to cover comparatively large areas and handle their work with efficiency and dispatch. An interesting feature of the meeting of the Board was the report of the Sub-Committee on Social Service, which recommended, among other things, the establishment of parish houses or rooms in connection with every church in the Diocese to be used as centers for church and social work in their respective communities. Another recommendation of this committee was the adoption, as far as possible, of a policy under which rectories in the country should be so constructed and equipped as to serve as models of comfortable, modern homes. Comprehensive reports were presented by committees in regard to the Summer School at Charlottesville and the Diocesan Parish Day Institutes, and it was the unanimous opinion of the Board that both of these should "carry on" again next year.

Executive Offices: The congregation of St. John's Church, Roanoke, has very kindly furnished, for the use of the Diocese, rooms in the parish house, No. 18 Elm Avenue, S. W. Here the work of the Diocese will be largely centralized. This will be the official headquarters of the Bishop, the place of meeting of the Executive Board, numerous committees, etc. The office is in charge of the Executive Secretary of the Diocese, who will, under the direction of the Bishop and the Executive Board, handle the correspondence of the office and assemble and have on file data of various kinds in regard to the work in the Diocese. Any persons interested in the work of the Church in Southwestern Virginia and desiring information in regard to it may address the Executive Secretary, Box 1068, Roanoke, Va., who will gladly render any assistance possible.

NORTH CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

Christ Church, Raleigh.

(We regret that owing to a mistake in the printing office, the account of the Centennial celebration of Christ Church, in last week's issue, was published as South Carolina news.)

Preparations for the Centennial celebration of Christ Church, Raleigh, the Rev. Milton A. Barber, rector, are rapidly assuming definite form, and the commemoration promises to be a memorable observance. Former members of the congregation scattered over widely separated sections are asked to manifest their love for the old parish by returning to Raleigh for this unique occasion. The celebration begins Sunday, October 9, and ends Wednesday night, October 12. Bishop Gailor is the special preacher on Sunday, and the announcement of his coming has been hailed with great satisfaction. Bishop Cheshire is the special speaker Sunday night, his subject being "The Former Rectors of the Parish." Monday the new chapel will be consecrated, and historical addresses by prominent laymen will be given at the night service. Tuesday the choir will give a musical cantata, and Wednesday night a large reception brings the celebration to a close. The rectors of Christ Church during the past hundred years have been Bishop John Stark Ravenscroft, who served from 1823 to 1828; the Rev. Charles P. Elliott, from 1828 to 1829; the Rev. George Washington Freeman, D. D., afterwards Missionary Bishop of the Southwest, from 1829 to 1840; the Rev. Richard Sharpe Mason, D. D., from 1840 to 1874; the Rev. Matthias M. Marshall, D. D., from 1874 to 1907; the Rev. Milton A. Barber, from 1907 to the present time.

Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan-Elect.

Standing Committees Confirm Dr. Shipman's Election.

It is announced by the Standing Committee of the Diocese of New York that the Standing Committees of thirty-six dioceses have confirmed the election of the Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan Bishop-elect of the Diocese of New York. This constitutes the necessary majority of such committees. Confirmations have not yet been received from the necessary number of bishops.

According to the New York Times, the Rev. Dr. Stuart L. Tyson, of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, has issued a statement denying a report which he said had been circulated that Dr. Herbert L. Shipman, Suffragan Bishop-elect, would decline to accept after his confirmation.

"A report has been widely circulated through the Church that Dr. Shipman intends to withdraw his name as soon as the bishops shall have confirmed his election as Suffragan Bishop of New York," Dr. Tyson said. "Dr. Shipman declines consistently to be interviewed, but I, who speak for him, desire to state that the report is without foundation. Dr. Shipman is a soldier; he has received his orders from the Church, and until those orders are countermanded he will obey them."

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Resignation of the Rev. Dr. Smith.

The Rev. Roland Cotton Smith, D. D., rector of St. John's Church for nearly twenty years, has tendered his resignation to the vestry, to become effective November 1. Dr. Smith was granted a year's leave of absence on account of ill health a little over a year ago, but failure to recuperate, as all had hoped he would, has necessitated his retirement from the active ministry.

Dr. Smith was graduated from Amherst College in 1882 with the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and was awarded his Master of Arts a year later. In 1885 he was graduated from the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass., and was ordained priest the year after. His charges have been assistant rector of St. Peter's Church, Beverly, Mass.; assistant rector Trinity Church, Boston; rector of St. John's Church, Northampton, Mass., and rector of St. John's Church, Washington. The news of Dr. Smith's resignation has been heard with regret by all who knew him, and he will be deeply missed by the Diocese as well as by his own parish.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

The Senior and Junior Brotherhoods of St. Andrew, in this Diocese, began their fall activities and organization by a joint meeting at St. John's Church, Georgetown, on Friday evening, September 23. Addresses were made by the Rev. W. B. Dent, of Rock Creek Parish, Mr. F. A. Williams, of Philadelphia, field secretary of the Brotherhood, and Mr. Edward Shields. One of the subjects discussed was the coming thirty-sixth annual convention of the Brotherhood at Norfolk, Va., from October 12 to 16.

The Bishop of Washington returned from his vacation, spent at Saunderstown, R. I., on Saturday, September 24.

Ordination.

On St. Matthew's Day, September 21, the Bishop of the Diocese ordained to the diaconate in All Hallow's Church, Snow Hill, Mr. John Marshall Wilson, a member of the parish. In the celebration of the Holy Communion, the Bishop was assisted by the Rev. Sidney A. Potter, the Litany was said by the Rev. Louis L. Williams, and Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Alfred L. Jones, rector. The candidate was presented by the Rev. J. F. Kirk, of Baltimore, some time rector of All Hallows' Parish, who also preached the sermon. Mr. Wilson is a student at the General Seminary, but has been serving the Diocese as lay reader at North East. He will resume his studies at once.

The Southern Convocation has been called to meet at St. Paul's Church, near Marion, October 4 and 5, 1912. A large attendance is expected.

Women of the Diocese to Conduct Clothing Shop.

The opening of a co-operative clothing shop for the benefit of social and religious work was announced by Miss Alice Ewing before a meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese held September 21 in Holy Trinity Parish House. The shop will be conducted by the women of the Diocese at 616 South Broad Street, adjoining the Pro-Cathedral of St. Mary, and the proceeds will be devoted to the social service, educational and missionary work of the Pro-Cathedral.

The Rev. Dr. George L. Richardson, vicar, is chairman of the committee in charge, and the temporary committee consists of Mrs. J. Willis Martin, Mrs. Philip M. Rhinelander, Mrs. William J. Taylor and Mrs. Alfred Stengel. Most of the clothing will be donated by the women of the Diocese, and a season's membership will cost $2.

Clerical changes in parishes and missions in the Diocese include the following: Rev. George W. Lamb, of Pittsburgh, goes to the Church of the Advent, Hatboro, October 1; Rev. George D. Harris, of Fall River, Mass., becomes rector of St. Mary's, Warwick; Rev. E. E. Durant, of St. Mary's Mission, Chester, goes to St. Cyril's, Coatesville, and Holy Cross, Bryn Mawr; Rev. Henry L. Phillips, D. D., Archdeacon of Colored Work, takes charge of St. Mary's Mission; Rev. Richard Bright, at St. Titus, Elmwood, in addition to his present work, takes charge of St. Monica's Mission.

Missionaries Visit Philadelphia: The Rev. Lloyd R. Craighill and Mrs. Craighill, of Anking, China, addressed the Foreign Committee of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese at Holy Trinity Parish House at a meeting held September 21.

The Rev. William W. Steele, Archdeacon of Cuba, preached at St. Stephen's Church at both the morning and evening services Sunday, September 25.

Gloria Dei: Mr. Thomas Weston Sparks, for many years a member of the vestry and rector's warden of Gloria Dei (Old Swedes) Church, Philadelphia, died at his home September 17, at the age of sixty-seven. He was for many years identified with the social and business life of Philadelphia, and was a member of many prominent organizations and fraternities.

Mr. Edward S. Oliver, for thirty years a vestryman of Gloria Dei Church, has been appointed rector's warden, to succeed Mr. Sparks.

The Sunday school will soon celebrate its Centenial. More than $3,500 has been expended by the church in renovations.

Today.

Our yesterdays, as last year's roses,
Have passed away;
Tomorrow, hovering cloud like o'er the horizon,
May never come our way;
The roses of a year ago, in silence long have lain,
Tomorrow's cloud of promise may not bring refreshing rain;
We cannot bring again the faded flowers,
We cannot count upon the future hours,
We only have today.

Only today to live, today to plan, to do,
So short a time to dream, to work and build,
And progress path pursue;
The morning hours speed quickly,
The noon day's warmth is chilled by lengthening shade,
And soon, too soon, the evening bell is sounded,
The day, like last year's roses,
In the dust is laid.

The day is gone, yet lives and deeds
'Spite of time's flight, live on;
In one short day a vision caught and shared,
May prove the goal and purpose of a century's run,
One noble deed performed in selflessness
May blaze the trail for countless pure crusades,
In one short day on Calvary the world was saved,
Because One, in all-giving love, atonement made.

So short a time, one day!
Yet in its space may be ignited flames
Whose light reach to eternity:
In its brief span the songs that we can sing
May still unrest and sooth through many a morrow,
Its cadence hovering like an angel's wing
To shield the tempted ones of earth,
And woo to peace some tumult of world sorrow.

Then use today, the present,
All today is ours! To grasp, to hold
And work our pattern in life's tapestry
For good or ill;
Today is ours to dream, to plan, to till the soil,
And sow into earth furrows
The grain or tares at will,
That make or mar tomorrow!

We have today, all of today for vision,
All of today is ours to plan, to do;
To build with those great ones of life the high roads,
To seek with earnest hearts the truth that unbars prison doors;
What though, ere long, the evening bell is sounded,
Brave souls who strive fear not the gathering night,
But calmly look with faith beyond its silence
And wait with peace the sure tomorrow's light.

A Cow-Bell and Procrastination.

Strange how some experiences of life stand clearly graven on our memory while others of greater import fade from recollection. One incident I remember as though it happened yesterday, yet fully a score of years have been spun into the roll of eternity since its occurrence. Though my dogs were the cause of it, I did not feel very bad. To be honest, I did a few grins under the shelter of my arms in the midst of it; and now that time enables me to see only its funny side, I verily believe there was a merry twinkle in the Bishop's eye as he kindly assured me I was not to blame. Of course, that was after it was all over. While it was going on the reverend gentleman was too busy to entertain humor.

Toward evening of an early winter day up in the Mackenzie River country I was on my way to join some Indians on a hunting trip. We had arranged to meet at the mouth of a certain small tributary, I having left them to go to a Hudson Bay post a hundred miles up stream for some white man grub. The trail had been bad and I and my dogs were tired and hungry. I thought I would never come to that tributary. I was sure some one had moved it. But no! suddenly the action of my team told me it was not far ahead.

Happy in knowing I would not have to camp alone another night, I tossed my dogs a cheery word and we were speeding over the last lap to comparative comfort when I heard a noise that sounded queer in that far-off region. I listened. I could hardly believe my ears; but, as I got nearer, I could hear plainly the b-lang, b-lang of a cowbell. "A cow-bell," I said to myself. "What is a cow-bell doing here" Of course, I knew what it was doing; what I meant was how did it come to be there. I thought of a white man and a horse, but who would bell a horse and turn it loose away up there at this time of year. I soon understood; for, as I turned a point, I saw the chief's eldest hopeful actively swinging an honest-to-goodness, full-grown cow-bell, its bass voice mingling with the shrill tenor of numerous camp-dogs.

Usually I would have been greeted with a joyful yelp from the young man, but now he was solemn as the father of all the owls of the North. What was the matter, I wondered?

"Lo, Neoch, what for you ring bell?" I shouted as I slid past.

"Bishop come. Make church," yelled the ringer as he belabored harder than ever the innocent air.

Pleased at hearing that I was to meet the Bishop, for he and I had met before and eaten out of the same frypan, I swung my team to the door of the chief's skin-house. The chief and I were "pertnurs."

"How do you do, Bishop Bompas?" I enquired with fitting decorum, for I saw that the chief's house had been prepared for worship; the Bishop sitting behind an improvised pulpit, or whatever it is that an Episcopal minister preaches from; my "pertnur" at his right, and the place arranged for the congregation—in fact, one or two were already seated.

It was almost dark now and the church was lit only by the fitful flames of the fire in its middle, so I dived out to my sled, with its dogs still harnessed, and got two candles which I placed one on each side of the Book lying on the pulpit. I did not wish to cause delay. I knew they would wait until I was seated. I also knew my "pertnur" to be inexorable as fate when "sarvise" was pending. I sat me in my corner and awaited proceedings. The "pews" were almost full now. The ringer was giving a last few spasmodic swings to the calling voice. The Bishop knelt. His congregation did likewise. Service had begun.

The code of the real dog of the North has one clause that his supposedly superior man would do well to follow; he has thorough respect for his neighbor's domain. He has a definite boundary surrounding the house of his master and never voluntarily crosses it. In this instance of my religion there were aliens right at the very gates of the house of Chief Joseph. True, they had been driven there by me, but that was a point to which the chief's dogs gave no heed. Hospitality was not in their curriculum. Besides, there was a feud between all the dogs in camp and mine; my team having come from a distant part of the country, and they had not yet been extended the paw of fellowship. I knew all this, but the urge of the occasion had kept me from taking time to guard against a very likely hostile demonstration. Even when I heard threats of war outside that sounded plainly above the voice of the good Bishop telling us about the loaves and fishes and the feeding of the multitude, I did not go out to insure peace. I fought against my better conviction and procrastinated—even if I did notice that some of the men in church were giving more attention to the angry voices outside than to the patiently relating voice within.

'Tis said that procrastination is the thief of time. The aphorism does not go far enough, for, in my instance, procrastination stole quiet and left turmoil rampant in its place. Procrastination seems to be quite a joker.

But to my story. The Bishop was right in the middle of the most interesting part of the immortal classic when the crisis came. Noises of many paws charging over well-trodden snow, a sled being overturned and dragged, and a perfect chorus of growls were heard; and the next moment the moosê-skin door was violently thrust aside, and my seared team, seeking sanctuary, with a pack of pursuers at their heels, charged pell mell into the skin-house. The dogs of war were loose.

Shall I ever forget it! The first to be overwhelmed by the wild rush was a lady who proudly wore the only calico dress in camp. After that no human eye could follow events in sequence. There was nothing but a mass of struggling dogs and brown humanity snarling and yelling. Men seized whatever first came to hand and used it to repel the intruders. Women and children continually screamed. Fire flew as combatants plunged into it. Soon all was darkness, for the pulpit with its twin lights went down; it being furthest from the door had stood the longest. The last I remember seeing of the Bishop was where he had himself squeezed tightly against the wall of the house in an effort to escape harm. My "pertnur" had sprung into the midst of the melee at its first sight. I? Oh, I doubled myself into as small a compass as possible and sat tight in my little corner and let things seeth. I remember thinking that my dogs were concluding that their confidence in my protection was sadly misplaced, for, of course, they suffered from clubs with the rest. Discrimination was out of the question.

But the tide was turning. Yelps of surrender were heard and shaggy forms were dimly seen rushing for the open. At last only whimpering women and children and breathless men remained. The next thing to do was to tidy the place.

I went outside and righted my sled and pawed around in it until I found more candles. These were soon shedding their light over "the battle's wreck." The fire was replenished and the house put in order. Once more my "pertnur's" skin-home showed its wonted appearance. The Bishop was appealed to by his host as to whether he would continue "sarvice" or not. I believe the Bishop would have taken up the thread of his rudely shattered discourse—if even to a reduced number of hearers, had he not known I was supperless. Perhaps he thought I was hungry—I was. The good old Bishop had often been "there" himself. Again I went to my sled, secured and fed my dogs, and brought in some real white man grub, something rare up there; meat, fish and berries being almost the sole food of the natives.

While eating supper I apologized to the Bishop, who had joined me to the extent of drinking a cup of tea.

"I'm sorry, Bishop, that I was the means of spoiling your service. I ought to have taken care of my dogs."

He placed his hand on my shoulder. "Don't mention it, Mac. Tomorrow morning I shall hold service before I go," was his gracious reply.

I turned to my "pertnur." "That fine bell you got, Joseph."

"Oh, yes! Bishoo Bummas bring me from sailor man (Herschel Island whaler). Bishoo Bummas he say I make church all time now," Joseph concluded proudly.

But my procrastination was to cost me more than not hearing the finish of a sermon; the matter of the calico dress had to be adjusted.

Early next morning a teary squaw waylaid me and displayed something that looked as if it had been through a threshing machine. Too bad it had happened just when the Bishop was here, was the burden of her complaint.

"All right! I'll get you new dress from company next time I go to post," was my promise. And all was quiet along the Mackenzie.

The Bishop gave us an uninterrupted sermon, and, after handshaking all around, he rolled into his sled and slid on his way up river.

That was the last I saw of him. He died a few years later. But his memory still lives in the hearts of his people to whom he had given so many years of his life.—Scott MacCraig, in Alaskan Churchman.

The Influence of Jesus Christ.

In all human history and experience have men ever discovered a more uplifting moral force than the companionship of Jesus Christ?

Think of the transforming influence that He exerted, in the days of His earthly life, upon the characters of that little band of men and women who companied with Him among the hills of Galilee. Business men and tax-gatherers, fishermen and soldiers, women in their homes and women on the streets—all climbed to heights of which they had never dreamed, and this simply through the influence of this strange man they had come to love. They simply may not have been able to analyze, perhaps hardly even realize, what had happened to them; all they knew was that He had come into their lives, and that that had made all the difference.

And, after He had left the earth as a visible presence, this kind of thing went on happening. Indeed, the magic of His presence was even more potent than before. Those who needed Him, and longed for Him, found Him entirely available, even though not visible to their earthly eyes. And this discovery was always as sunlight flooding into darkened lives.

Here is, indeed, the very heart and score of Christian experience; and from generation to generation it has never failed. Into lives wearied by failure, bruised by pain and sorrow, barren of hope, empty of meaning and purpose, He comes, when the door is open, and the coming always turns the scale.

"Jesus Christ came into my cell last night," wrote Samuel Rutherford, in prison in Aberdeen, "and every stone of it glowed like a ruby." "Beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness"—these are some of Christ's exchanges.

Is there a man or woman among us who does not need this transfiguring touch on character and circumstance? Is there one of us who can afford to do without the proffered friendship of Jesus Christ?—E. S. Woods.

As to my eager lips
I hold Life's brimming cup
Guide Thou my trembling hand,
Oh! Saviour of my soul;
Lest in my blindness
I lose the best in it,
And find but bitter dregs

A Wedding Prayer.

Grant Thy grace to these Thy servants whose lives are being united before Thee, that they may be true helpers to each other, bearing one another's burdens, having compassion with each infirmity, walking together in faith and holiness and love. May their house be one in which Thou dost love to dwell in which they talk with Thee as with a familiar friend. Supply their temporal wants as may be best for them, and make them a blessing to others. Fill their lives with love for the best things in Thy world, and may they rejoice in each other and in Thee all the days of their lives. Whether in prosperity or adversity, in health or in sickness, may they always find in Thee their comfort and strength and their abiding peace. Amen.—Good News.

A Sunday school teacher had instructed her class that each child should repeat a verse of Scripture when the offering was made. The plate, containing many pennies, had gone down the line, when the child next to the last said, "The Lord loveth a cheerful giver," depositing a nickel.

Either the verses had given out or the child at the end of the bench was overcome at her neighbor's generosity, for she said, "A fool and his money are soon parted."

The Summons.

I want to go back to a place my heart remembers,
An old square house on the top of a sentinel hill,
Where slow Time loiters along however it will—
Blue Junes and gray Novembers.

There spring returns with the music of whippoorwills calling
And sudden violets where a slope is green
And smoke adrift on a south wind spicy and keen
When the slow, damp dusk is falling.

There autumn comes with a click of frost in the night,
And a hickory log and a lump of lightwood pine
Flame on the hearth and set the gloom ashine
With a riot of ruddy light.

An unkempt, ragged old guardian wall incloses
An arbor purple with grapes and a lone pear tree
And borders of mignonette and savory
And ranks of crimson roses.

There's a stream near by, where mellow-bugs dart and skip,
That chuckles aloud and talks in cheery tones
And brims a cool deep basin among the stones
Where dusty feet can dip.

The doors stand wide in the tranquil house on the hill,
And the wind walks down the hall and stirs a curtain—
The wind or a spirit, never I could be certain—
And the rooms are sweet and still.

Ripe acorns rain on the roof, a fairy din,
And wake me deep in the night-time over and over;
At many a dawn a cow gets into the clover
And rings the sunrise in.

A curly path through a field, a sagging rail,
A hole in a hedge, a mark on a sassafras tree;
The way that my boyhood went is blazed for me
In signs that cannot fail.

Nothing will hush this crying, whether or no!
My heart is fain for the miracle it remembers,
The beauty of old sweet Aprils and Septembers;
I cannot choose but go.

The long highways of the world are seven times seven;
Though a man should travel them all from shore to shore
And yet at the last find one old trail no more,
He has missed the road to heaven.

I will turn my back on the noisy markets of men.
O roses, wait in the sun by the garden wall;
O Angel, touch the curtains in the hall—
I am coming home again!

—Nancy Byrd Turner.

For the Young Folks

A Prayer for Morning.

The morning bright,
With rosy light,
Hath waked me from my sleep;
Father, I own
Thy love alone
Thy little ones doth keep.

All through the day
I humbly pray,
Be Thou my Guard and Guide;
My sins forgive,
And let me live,
Blest Jesus, near Thy side.

Oh make Thy rest
Within my breast,
Great Spirit of all grace!
Make me like Thee;
Then shall I be Prepared to see Thy face.

To Father, Son,
And Spirit One,
Great God Whom I adore,
All glory be,
My God, to Thee,
Both now and evermore.

What Saved the Wishing Shoes.

They were pretty shoes, and the elfin cobbler had mended all four pairs very neatly. The fairly tucked them into her bag carefully, for they were wishing shoes and therefore very valuable; marvelous things happened when people put them on. She smiled at the thought how pleased her four little fairykins would be to get them back.

The Fairytown and Elfinville stage was about to start on its return trip. The fairy climbed into the vacant seat and settled herself comfortably. There were four other passengers: a younger fairly, a good-natured old dwarf, a jolly elf and a frowzy-looking bird. She noticed that all were in good spirits exxcept the cross-looking bird, who wore a big black fur collar and grumbled every time the coach went over a stone.

Now the first law of fairyland reads, "You must not grumble," and uncomfortable things begin to happen the minute anyone breaks that law. The other passengers begged their cross companion to stop, but he kept right on. Sure enough, in a few moments the stage began to slow down; it bumped and rattled and at length came to a dead stop. Then, worse of all, it fell to pieces. The wheels of water-lily leaves rolled away; the grasshopper engine gave a jump and disappeared altogether; the driver vanished with the rest. The coach had been made from an empty bird's nest, and all at once the passengers found themselves dreadfully tangled up with sticks and string. No one was hurt, but they were all a long way from home, and the outlook was discouraging. The bad-tempered passenger hopped up into the nearest tree and went to sleep; it was plainly his intention to fly home by himself as soon as he had rested, which showed that he was selfish as well as cross-grained and crabbed. The others picked themselves up and found a smooth brown stone where they could sit and talk things over.

"How very fortunate that I thought to bring this basket of luncheon," said the elf.

The fairy sighed. "There are four pairs of wishing shoes in this bag," she said, "but they are for my four children. Of course they would help us out, but as everyone knows, it spoils wishing shoes if anyone for whom they are not intended wears them."

At that the bird in the tree gave a croak. "Wear 'em anyway," he said.

The younger fairy stiffened. "We'll do nothing of the sort," she said sharply.

"Of course we will not," chimed in the elf.

So that settled the matter.

The old dwarf sat silent for a long time. At last he spoke. "If there is any truth in a tale I once heard," he mused, "then somewhere near this spot there is a huge turtle who crawled into a cool place and fell asleep and never has remembered to wake up. If we can find him, we might coax him to carry us home."

The rest of the company needed no further hint. They slipped down from the smooth stone and scampered round the woods, peering into every crack and cranny that they could find. They succeeded only in waking several very sleepy field mice who had never so much as heard of the turtle. But still the company kept on hunting.

The fairy with the wishing shoes stayed behind to take care of the luncheon. As she sat wondering what she should say to her children if any of the wishing shoes should be spoiled a tear rolled down her cheek and splashed on the stone beside her.

Now, tears are a great disgrace in fairyland, and so she hurriedly pulled out her kerchief to mop the tear up. As she rubbed she began to smile; the harder she rubbed the more cheerful grew her smile. By the time the others came back, hot and tired, the top of the stone was quite shiny, and the fairy was laughing.

"Why are you so joyful?" they asked. For their own part felt very doleful.

But the gay fairy only smiled all the more. While her companions were resting she danced merrily about; she found some bluets and made herself a collar; then she picked a water-lily leaf from a near-by pond and gave it to the other fairy to use as a sunshade. She seemed much pleased over something. The others privately thought that it was about time for her to take the wishing shoes out of her bag and put them to some use. Just as the dwarf had made up his mind to say so she suggested airily that they all climb up on the stone and dance the skipdink dance.

Her companions were annoyed with her, but since they could think of nothing else to do with themselves they adopted her sugestion. One by one they climbed back upon the stone, and there they danced as gayly as they could in so small a space. Soon they all forgot that they were cross and began to sing, and then a strange thing happened. The stone, which was really no stone at all, gave a lurch that came near throwing the astonished company to the ground. The fairy had set them to dancing on the back of the sleeping turtle! He had been asleep so long that the moss had grown over him, and he looked like nothing but a great rock. The fairy had made the discovery while she was rubbing away the tear.

The old turtle was astonished and somewhat offended at being awakened and began at once to run away. At least he went hurrying off as fast as he could. To be sure, it was not very fast, but the ground was rough and the fairy people had all they could do to keep from falling off. Presently they set up a wail of despair, for they realized all at once that the turtle was going entirely in the wrong direction. The more noise the fairy folk made the faster he thumped and bumped along.

"There is no use in trying to put on the wishing shoes now," gasped the fairy. "But if every one of you will hold mousy still I will try to persuade the turtle to stop."

Then the fairy leaned over and said something very softly in turtle language, and sure enough the turtle stopped at once.

They all scrambled down in a great hurry and said kind and polite things to the turtle; they even rubbed off the shreds of moss that hung from his sides. The fairy told him all that had been happening in the forest while he was taking his long nap. She also told him about her children's wishing shoes.

Being good-natured at heart, he let them climb on his back again and then he started off once more, this time in the right direction. He had slept so long, however, that whole forests of baby pine trees had grown up, and he was not sure of the way; the old dwarf had to move up and sit where he could give him directions. But it was a wonderful ride, and the chipmunks came running to see the strange sight. The sulky passenger in the tree waked as the turtle went past. He did not, of course, deserve a place, but his former companions moved up and made room for him. He seemed really softened by their kindness.

That night after the fairykins had put on their shoes and wished one wish apiece, their mother put them to bed in four big pink tulips and told them all about her adventures and how funny the old turtle had looked. The little fairies bobbed up and down in the nodding tulips and clapped their hands.

"Tell us," they begged, "what it was that you said to the turtle to make him stop."

"Guess," said the fairy.

They all guessed, but each one guessed a different thing, and all of them were wrong.

"Now go to sleep," said the fairy. "In the morning you may guess some more."

But the children would not be quiet. "Oh, tell us now," they cried.

"No," laughed the fairy. "Go to sleep!"

The smallest got up on his knees in the middle of his tulip. "Please," he begged.

His mother kissed him. "There, you have guessed it," she whispered. "It was—please."—Margaret Northington in Youth's Companion.

Too Much for the Whistle.

When I was a child about seven years of age my friends one holiday filled my pockets with half-pence.

I went directly to a shop where toys were sold for children, and being charmed with the sound of a whistle that I saw on my way in the hands of another boy, I voluntarily offered him all my money for it.

I then came home, and went whistling over the house, much pleased with my whistle, but disaurbing all the family.

My brothers and sisters and cousins, understanding the bargain which I had made, told me that I had given four times as much for it as it was worth.

This put me in mind of what good things I might have bought with the rest of the money, and they laughed at me so much for my folly that I cried with vexation.

My reflections on the subject gave me more chagrin than the whistle gave me pleasure.

This little event, however, was afterwards of great use to me, the impression continuing on my mind, so that often, when I was tempted to buy some unnecessary thing, I said to myself, "Do not give too much for the whistle," and so I saved my money.—From Benjamin Franklin's Life.

Faith.

I don't understand the hills,
Or the bounding sea,
Or the laughing mountain rills—
How they came to be.
I don't understand the sun,
Or the twinkling star—
How they ever were begun,
But I know them are.
So with faith—its mysteries
I can't analyze,
Holding certain verties
Too deep for my eyes;
But I know this heart of mine
Rises from despair
Into joy and peace divine.
Knowing they are there.

Sermons in Stones.

Theodora C. Cox.

Often had I been admonished that I must learn to control my temper. I had been making an earnest effort to do so. On this occasion, when I was ten years old, a playmate said, "Give me three shots, and I can put your doll's eye out."

"No!" I screamed. But she had not waited for permission, and her aim was true. One shot had done the work. Not only the eyes, but the whole head of Allen, my only boy doll, lay in fragments at our feet, as he flopped one-sidedly against the rock on which he had been gracefully leaning.

"You've killed him!" I screamed, and rushed at her. Dodging around me, she hid behind the very rock against which Allen lay, and I, rage-blind, for the moment lost her.

During that moment I spied the sharp, flat stone which had done the damage, and, pouncing upon it, said: "She killed Allen with this; I'm going to kill her with it."

Then the stone seemed to speak in words similar to some I had heard read from the Bible the night before. It said: "Let her that is without sin cast the first stone."

As I stood and looked dazedly at it, the stone slipped between my fingers and fell to the ground.

My playmate, coming from behind the rock, put her arms around me, saying: "I didn't know you loved your doll like that, Tiny. I'm sorry I broke it."

"Him," I corrected, as I stooped to gather the pieces into my lap. "Come help me bury him, Margaret."

"No," she objected. "We'll get a new head for him, and he'll be as good as new. Let's go skip stones. This is a fine skipper," and she picked up the same sharp, flat stone.

It was a good skipper. It skipped three times and landed on the opposite bank. Margaret waded over for it, and skipped it back. I sent it on another trip, and that time it got mixed with other flat stones near the other bank. Though the stone was lost, however, the sermon it preached has lasted. I remembered it, not only when I looked at the good-as-new Allen, but on many occasions when I really needed it.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Leslie Fenton Potter, formerly dean of St. Mark's Pro-Cathedral, Grand Rapids, Mich., has accepted the rectorship of St. Mark's Church, Frankford, Pa., succeeding to the vacancy caused by the death of the Rev. John B. Harding. Mr. Potter is an alumnus of Washington University and of the General Theological Seminary, and was ordained by Bishop Tuttle in 1894. He has been in charge of St. Mark's since last June.

The Rev. Frank A. Ridout, for four years rector of Holy Trinity and St. George's Churches, Accomac County, Va., has accepted a call to St. John's Church, Halifax (Houston), Va. After November 1 his address will be Halifax, Va.

The Rev. H. Fields Saumenig, rector of St. Peter's Church, Rome, Ga., has returned from a four months' trip abroad. He visited Italy, France and England and represented the Rome Rotary Club at the International Convention in Scotland.

The Rev. Allen Evans, Jr., assistant to Rev. John Mockridge, D. D., rector of St. James' Church, Philadelphia, has accepted a call to the rectorship of the Church of the Atonement, Morton, Delaware County, Pa., and he will also have charge of St. James' Mission, Prospect Park. He will assume his new charges October 1, succeeding the Rev. Charles F. Scofield, who has accepted a call to the rectorship of St. James' Church, Perkiomen, Pa.

The address of the Rev. Walter C. Roberts is Union Seminary, New York City, corner Broadway and One Hundred and Twentieth Street.

The Rev. Dr. Edwin A. White, rector-emeritus of Christ Church, Bloomfield and Glen Ridge, N. J., has changed his address to 9 Clinton Road, Glen Ridge, N. J.

The Rev. Goodrich R. Fenner has resigned as rector of St. Philip's Church, Uvalde, Tex., to accept the chaplaincy of the West Texas Military Academy, San Antonio.

Deaconess A. L. Ranson, of Sendai, Japan, returns October 1 to her home at Harper's Ferry, W. Va., for a year's furlough. Deaconess Ranson has served for many years in Japan, and her work has been most successful.

The Rev. Karl Morgan Block, rector of St. John's Church, Roanoke, Va., has, with his family, been spending the month of September at Orange Va., and Avalon, N. J. In his absence his pulpit has been occupied by the Rev. W. B. Lee, of Gloucester; the Rev. William Byrd Lee, Jr., of Blacksburg, and the Rev. Claudius F. Smith, the Missioner of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia.

E PLURIBUS UNUM

Over 14,000 of the population of our country are of foreign birth. Over 21,000,000 are the children of foreign parentage.

Almost every parish has within its bounds from one individual to tens of thousands of these people, an enormous number of whom are without church, without real American friends, out of touch with American and Christian life.

It is not a mere slum proposition nor a social "uplift" side issue. Many of our foreign-born neighbors are the equals of our Church people financially, often intellectually. It is such who are often the lonliest and who are becoming the mosy cynical.

The children of the foreign-born, the schoolmates of our children, are all too often growing up with but a veneer of Americanism, contemptuous of their own parents and ignorant of God.

The motto of our great country is "E Pluribus Unum"—out of one, many. The United States is, in fact, to-day made up of many races intended to become one, but are being kept aloof from one another. This is unpleasant, dangerous, un-American and un-Christian.

What are we going to do about it?

In the little parish of Holy Trinity, Iron Mountain, Michigan, eleven nationalities worship together in Christian brotherhood and American fellowship because the rector met them half-way, tried to understand their problems, and succeeded.

Other parishes in different parts of the country are doing the same in this great work for God, our neighbors and our country.

WHAT IS YOUR PARISH DOING?

The Foreign-Born Americans Division of the Department of Missions was created by our Church in 1919 following the vote in General Convention. The Secretary, Rev. Thomas Burgess, and the Field Director, Rev. William C. Emhardt, with the help of others they have called to their aid, are developing leadership in the Church to show the way to meet the responsibility we all as Christians bear to our foreign-born neighbors and their children.

This is the work that every diocese and parish can do. Many of them already are doing it. The Foreign-Born Americans Division stands ready to help in any way in their power any diocese or parish, either by correspondence or personal visitations.

"FOREIGNERS OR FRIENDS"

This is the title of the Division's latest publication and embodies the result of nation-wide experience. It has been prepared in co-operation with the Department of Christian Social Service and the aid of many experts. It answers in detail the question constantly asked by parishes, "What shall we do, and how?" It provides the essential text-book training for volunteer workers and is full of practical suggestions. It is recommended for parish discussion groups. Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, $1.00; in lots of 10 or more, 75c. Write for supply list of material published free for general distribution.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The cross of Christ is still the world's magnet.

Do you make it a rule to ask the Lord to go with you when you start for your place of business?

The best furnishings of a house are happy faces; the best seasoning of daily bread is a smile; the best music to soothe weariness is laughter.

"Do to others as they do to you" is the maxim of the world. "Do to others as ye would that they should do to you," is the precept of the kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ.—A. G. Brown.

It is not religion that costs too much. Sins cost too much. Many taxes are caused by sins—our battleships, our armies, our jails, our lunatic asylums are due to sins.—Bishop-elect Shipman, of New York.

A little kindly deed in some life cast
Is never vain; its ripples running free
May widen with the years and touch at last
The shining beaches of eternity!
—A. W. Peach.

"Christ is the Life, and, therefore, Christ is the Resurrection. And the thing that we call death is but a film which spreads above, but has no power to penetrate into the depths of the relationship between us and Him."

Our Lord conquered sin and Satan for us, in order that He might conquer them in us; and that we might conquer them for Him, through His love constraining and His strength enabling us.—J. C. Hare.

What hope can there be for a creature like man, intellectual, spiritual, responsible, if he will not think? You can do nothing with a man who is not earnest—but you may do much with an earnest man, though a doubter.—A. R. Raleigh.

"The work we count so hard to do
He makes it easy, for He works too;
And the days that seem long to live
are His,
A bit of His bright eternities;
And close to our need His helping is."

We link our weakness with omnipotence; our blindness with omniscience. This is the privilege of the destitute, the feeble, of those who are thwarted and cast down, who cannot save themselves. Behold, to them, too, it is given to save others.—James Hinton.

Independence will not preserve and save a nation. It is only a means to attain the righteous living of a nation. And no nation, as no individual, can live righteously that lives to its self-determined self alone.—Piert Masaryk, of Slovakia.

When we were leaving Liverpool, after my father's death, writes Bishop Carpenter, I went with my mother, as she wished to bid "good-bye" to Dr. McNeill. As we were leaving, my mother mentioned that I was to be ordained before long. "Oh," he said, "I wish I had known that." Then, coming near to me, he laid his hand upon my shoulder, and said, "At first you will think that you can do everything, then you will be tempted to think that you can do nothing; but don't let yourself be cast down: you will learn that you can do what God has for you to do.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., OCTOBER 8, 1921. No. 41.

THE POWER OF PUBLIC OPINION

As a man climbing a mountain will stop now and then at some clear space to catch his breath and look out over the widening view that spreads beneath him, and then goes on refreshed for the further climb, so it is a good thing that Christian people who are climbing up toward some ideal should stop to catch the encouragement of the revelation of their progress, and be glad in the sure fact that they are drawing nearer to their goal.

Last spring this and other Church papers appealed to Christian people to use their influence to strengthen all the forces which were trying to bring about an international conference on disarmament. At that time the situation hung in an uncertain balance. Those in Congress who were thoroughly in earnest about the conference seemed then in a somewhat lonely minority. There was much apathy, and some open and cynical disbelief. There were no clear indications that the administration had determined that such a conference should be called. Then began the slow and silent, yet ultimately irresistible, surging of public opinion. It rose like a tide. It sounded in newspapers everywhere. It found voice in churches, and lodges, and other associations of men and women. Finally came the great appeal from the Federal Council of the Churches that on a given Sunday all the churches and synagogues in America should sound the call for the conference. This, in large measure, was done, and petitions and letters in great number began to pour into Congress and the White House.

Doubtless, at the time there were a great many people who did what they were asked to do, but did it faintheartedly, and without real belief in its effect. "Who am I," men and women said to themselves, "that any word from me should bear effect? What good could a single letter from one private citizen do in a matter which concerns tens of millions in this country?" Yet, nevertheless, it was the message from thousands and ten thousands of individuals which blended into an irresistible force. Because the people wanted it, because the plain people told their representatives that they must support it, the disarmament conference is now assured. It will meet in Washington on November 11, the anniversary of the armistice. It will meet because the people willed that it should meet.

Some time ago we sent letters to a number of the leaders in the United States Senate. We wanted to find out at first hand whether it was true, as we believed, that the expression of the people of the churches had had a powerful effect in bringing the disarmament conference about. Here are three replies from three leaders of different senatorial groups. The first letter is from Senator La Follette, of Wisconsin, a Republican progressive. The second is from Senator Hitchcock, who was Democratic spokesman when President Wilson sought the ratification of the Treaty of Versailles and the League of Nations. The third is from Senator Borah, who was patron of the original resolution asking the President to call a disarmament conference.

I believe that the campaign for disarmament was very effective in bringing about the adoption of the Borah amendment to the naval bill.

I have always been a staunch advocate of the exercise by the people of their right of petition to Congress, and in my opinion it is a most effective means of bringing to the attention of their representatives their position on important legislation.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE.

I have no hesitation in saying that the outspoken attitude of the churches of the United States on the subject of disarmament has been an important influence in bringing the matter to a head. I have no means of measuring the force of this church influence, and I cannot even tell you how many churches acepted the suggestion of those who originated the idea for action, but inasmuch as all the expressions from churches were of the same purport and there was no disagreement in church organizations, I am inclined to think that there has been a general assumption that all religious organizations favored disarmament, and this fact has had an important influence.

G. M. HITCHCOCK.

I have no doubt that the expression of opinion of the Christian congregations in America and the Jewish synagogues upon this important subject resulted in great good and helped most substantially to advance the cause.

I was greatly pleased when this action was taken, and too much credit cannot be given the churches for the part which they took in the cause.

WILLIAM E. BORAH.

From these letters a single message is plain. The will of the citizens at home can make itself felt in Washington. This nation will choose, and will do, what the people want and are in earnest to express.

Now that the conference is assured, it remains that Christian people should surround it with an atmosphere of challenging expectation. This is a subtle thing, but it is very powerful. If the people are thinking of this conference, and talking about it in every-day conversations, the newspapers will reflect this interest. The attention of the country will be centered upon the conference when it meets. The conference will know that. It will know that it must render an account, not to any little narrow clique, but to the great, sober judgment and deep desire of the whole people.

For all Christian congregations there is immediate suggestion in the request which has just been made to the President by the National League of Women Voters. He has been asked to call upon all the churches to hold services of prayer on the morning of November 11, when the disarmament conference convenes. It will be a mighty and inspiring factor in the right shaping of the conference if on that day multitudes of people are calling upon God to bless it and to guide it. As Christians we dare not do less; and there is a deep sense in which the utmost that any of our planning might arrive at could do no more.

THE MESSAGE OF THE BROTHERHOOD

When this number of the Southern Churchman comes to the hands of its readers, hundreds of men and boys will be turning their faces toward Norfolk for the great Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

The Church needs the message which the Brotherhood symbolizes—the message of the disciple who became a witness-bearer for his Master to men.

The figure of Jesus came one day across Andrew's path and won his instant loyalty. Then Andrew did that thing which was so simple, and yet in its influence so immeasurable—he went and found his own brother and brought him to Jesus. He shared the new experience which had come to him. He called another into the fellowship with the Master Whom his own heart was resolved to be committed to.

How we do need that same spirit everywhere and always if the Church is to grow! We must have men whose first impulse, when the power of Christ has begun to mean something real to them, shall be to go and pass that power on to others. The spread of Christianity cannot be left to ministers or to any other supposedly special class. It must depend upon the fine naturalness of the contact of man with man wherever any Christian has gained something out of his Christianity which he knows his friends would be the better for.

One weakness in this Church of ours comes from the very definiteness of our ecclesiastical organization. We make much of the orders of the ministry, their historic authority, their dignity and importance. We ordain men to ministerial orders only after long training, and through a most solemn and impressive form. All this has its obvious values, which we do not need to emphasize; but it has its dangers too. Often there seems a great gulf fixed between the ministers and the laity. Men in the congregation imagine that since the spiritual leaders are such specially chosen and specially trained persons, therefore spiritual work must be a very unusual and difficult business. They think it calls for peculiar manners and methods which the ordinary man is not supposed to know about. So the laity generally leave anything that approaches personal recruiting of disciples for the Master wholly to the clergy. They are embarrassed at the idea that they ought to be seeking men and winning men to the fellowship of Christ.

But the truth which we need to have emphasized is that which the Brotherhood of St. Andrew has always proclaimed. That truth is the priesthood of all believers, interpreted in the vital contacts of every day. Not by ministers only, but by all those who know Him and love Him, must the Spirit of Jesus be mediated if He is to become the Lord of life. May God speed the Brotherhood in all its effort to make clear the naturalness of this ideal!

LATEST INFORMATION RESPECTING THE BROTHERHOOD CONVENTION

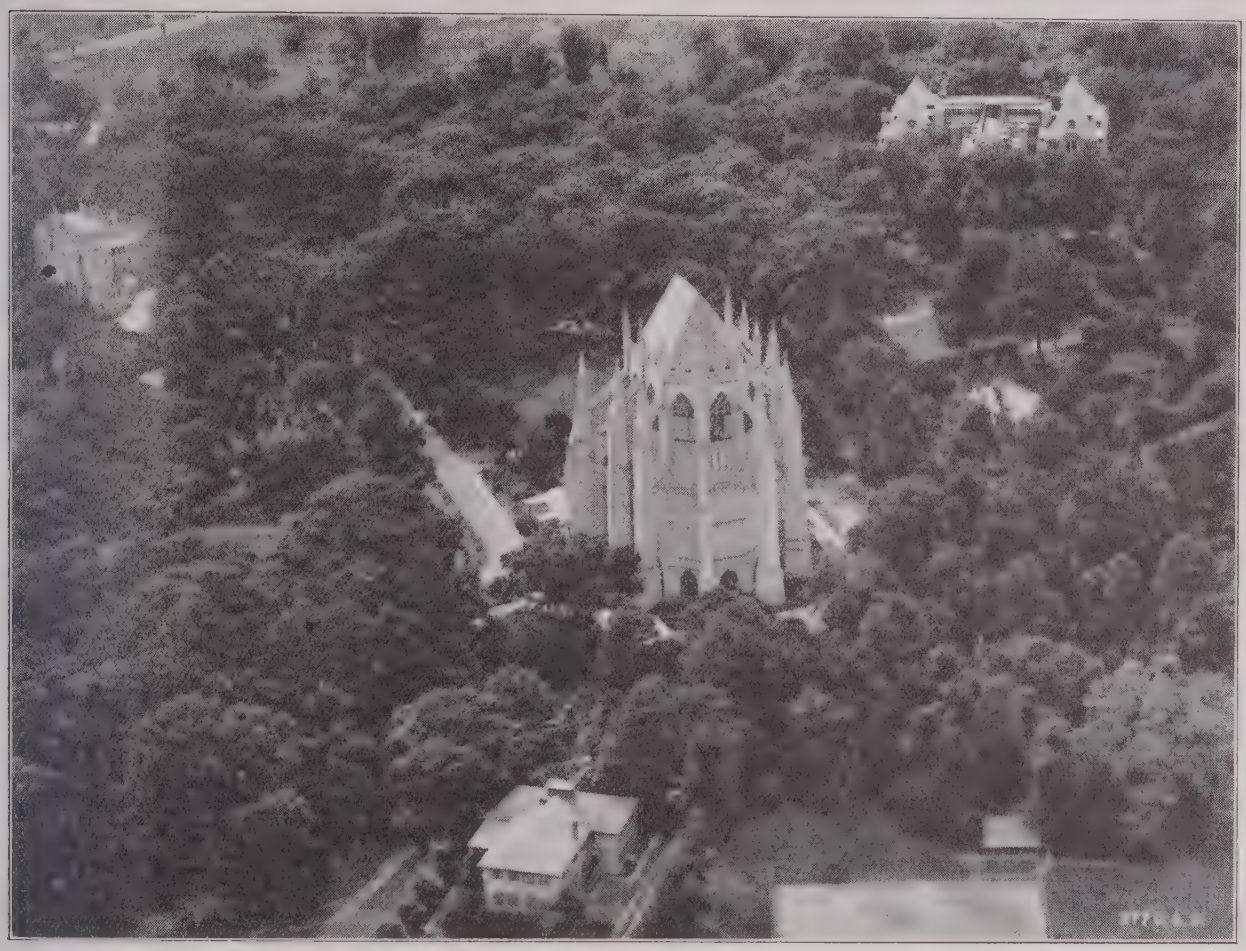
Final arrangements for the Norfolk Convention of the Brotherhood are now completed. The Convention days are Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16. The outstanding features of the Convention will be three daily Quiet Talks on the Bible by the Rev. Dr. Griffith Thomas; Family Prayer, by the Rev. Dr. E. L. Woodward, Dean of Education of Virginia; an address in Convention Hall on The Church's Teaching Mission, by the Rev. Dr. W. A. R. Goodwin, of Rochester, N. Y.; the Convention Missionary Service, with Bishop Overs, of Liberia, and Canon Skey, of Toronto, as speakers; a service for the presentation of the Call to the Ministry, with Bishop Guerry, of South Carolina, and Rev. Dr. Hubert Carleton, of Chicago, as speakers; the preparation for the Corporate Communion, to be conducted by the Rev. G. Ashton Oldham, of St. Ann's, Brooklyn, and the charge to the Convention on Sunday afternoon, by Bishop Darst, of East Carolina.

An important part of the program will be the pilgrimage to Jamestown and Williamsburg, occupying all of Friday. A special steamer will be used in going to Jamestown Island.

One hundred automobiles are being secured, and as many of that number as are needed, or more, will meet the large party at Jamestown at noon, and take the pilgrims overland eight miles to Williamsburg, where a visit will be made to the famous College of William and Mary, once a Church college, and always one of fine character and traditions. Dr. Goodwin, formerly rector of Old Bruton Church in Williamsburg, after luncheon served in the college dining hall, will make a brief address there on some of the traditions and outstanding features of that splendid educational centre. President Chandler will welcome the delegates.

And finally, in the neighboring Old Bruton Church, the oldest building of any communion in the United States in continuous service as a church, a service will be held, and the present rector, the Rev. E. Ruffin Jones, will say something regarding its history. Recreation will follow, and late in the afternoon the fleet of motor cars will take the delegates the twenty-seven miles to Newport News, from which point they will cross in a steamer to Norfolk, arriving in ample time for supper and the evening service.

It is expected that as an informal part of the Convention program, representative speakers will be present to discuss the latest plans of the Nation-Wide Campaign, the Church Mission of Help and the Work Among the Foreign-Born. Bishop Davenport, of Easton, is announced for an address on the Work of the Church Among Seamen.



Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D.,
Bishop of Southern Virginia.

On the Sunday morning will be the Corporate Communion as usual. It will be at Christ Church, and Bishop Tucker will be the celebrant. At 11 o'clock, in as many churches throughout the city as their rectors and pastors desire, laymen, and some clergy, of the Convention will make addresses of a general character on the common subject, "Am I My Brother's Keeper?" It is hoped thus to bring the challenge to personal service to as many Christian people of all creeds as is possible.

The Convention, contrary to the usual custom, will close Sunday afternoon instead of evening, with a general mass meeting in Convention Hall, where the memorial record will be read, the Convention's message to the Brotherhood adopted, and the charge to the Brotherhood given. The main Convention will have as its meeting place the large auditorium of the Ghent Club, situated in a beautiful outlying residential district. The principal services of the Convention are to be held in Christ Church, on the most beautiful in America, situated a few rods from the Ghent Club. The Church Boys' Convention, coincident with the main Convention, will have its hall and general headquarters in Christ Church Parish House.

Special rates and excursions have been announced from six different sections of the country, namely: New Orleans and Atlanta, St. Louis and Cincinnati, Chicago and Indianapolis, Detroit and Pittsburgh, Toronto and Buffalo, and Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore.

For immediate information regarding any detail, inquiries should be addressed to Mr. Robert M. Hughes, Jr., Box 317, Norfolk, Va.

THE WASHINGTON CATHEDRAL PARTIALLY BUILT.
View Toward the Sanctuary From the Rear.

THE NATIONAL CATHEDRAL AT WASHINGTON

By Canon DeVries, Ph. D., D. D.

Hitherto there has been no great building at Washington of commanding size and beauty to witness to Christ and to bring to the mind of visitors, as well as of residents, that we are a Christian nation dedicated not merely to material ends and earthly prosperity, but also to the service of God and of humanity, whose motto is "In God We Trust," and who ultimately draw our inspiration and power for endeavor and achievement not from natural resources or human strength, but from God Himself.

Washington Cathedral, as planned and under construction, aims to teach and inspire by the pure beauty and power of the building itself. At the present time the finished portion, the Apse, or eastern end, visible from many open spaces and high points in the city and nearby parts of Maryland and Virginia when illumined at night by flood lights, is an object of incomparable beauty, bringing many admiring visitors, as well as residents, to see it at close range, and a symbol and vision of the Heavenly City itsel. The exquisite gothic arches and pinnacles pointing heavenward, the flying buttresses, the effect of light and shade, the sheer height, the grace and proportions of the whole, turn men's thoughts to the highest things and to seek those things which are above. This is but one-fourteenth of the whole structure as planned, and the towers will rise many feet above the present fabric. The cathedral itself in its totality will therefore prove of rare beauty and power and inspiration.

But a cathedral is meant to witness to Christ and to help humanity, not only by means of its beauty, but also because it is a dynamic centre, a central dynamo plant, as it were, for all manner of activities for the promotion of religion, education and philanthropy in the community and in the nation. It is a power-house whence many spiritual currents radiate to keep lights burning and spiritual forces at work at points far and remote from the cathedral itself, just as trolley cars run, industrial plants operate, and electric lights shine far away from the central dynamo whence ultimately all their activity derives.

For instance, one of the clergy of a great Cathedral, assisted by his staff, is expected to be the guide, director and supervisor of the religious education work of a community and of a diocese, to make our Sunday schools effective agencies for the training of the children in religion and ethics, in ideals of character and service. He also leads in recruiting and training men for the ministry. Washington Cathedral being national in its aims and range, this clergyman is also busily employed in the religious education activities of the Province of Washington, and also those undertaken under authority of the General Convention and of the Department of Religious Education.

The Cathedral trustees have founded and maintain on the Close two great schools, one for girls and one for boys, attended between them by some 350 pupils. The plan here is to give a thorough, modern education, inspired by the principles of the Christian religion and aiming at producing well-founded and idealistic leaders for the service of the Church and the nation.

When the endowments are enlarged and the Cathedral's staff is completed, there will also be a clergyman expert in social service, who with a corps of assistants will devote himself to developing works of philanthropy for the benefit of the community and of the Province and the Church in the whole nation, in order to work towards the great aim of establishing the reign of justice and love in all human relations. Already one of the cathedral clergy has devoted a great deal of time to organizing and placing on a permanent basis the social service work of the Diocese of Washington, and, co-operating with the Bishop, aided in the establishment of a civic centre in one of the down town churches of Washington, in a neighborhood full of transient sojourners, and all manner of social problems. The neighborhood has so many men and women drifting in from all over the country and getting into personal and other difficulties in the national capital, that the work of this civic centre is little less than nation-wide in its benefits. This member of the cathedral staff, also in co-operation with the Bishop, has been very active in various aspects of the provincial social service endeavors, and at times in those of the General Department of Social Service.

On the devotional and evangelistic side a cathedral staff, when complete, includes a clergyman with assistants who give their time and thought to looking out for teh weaker congregations and those in difficulties, and to individuals who need the consolations and the inspiration of religion. They conduct missions, quiet days and retreats, and missionary activities in the city, the adjacent counties, the province and the national Church are all within the purview of this officer of the cathedral and his helpers.

At the Cathedral itself many agencies and influences are maintained for the benefit of the community and of the many visitors and temporary sojourners at the national capital. It is absolutely a free Church. There are no rented pews whatever. In fact, there are no pews at all, but chairs, and worshippers are shown seats in the order of their arrival without other preference. The beautiful worship and superb music and faithful preaching by men prominent in the eye of the nation are at the service of all who may wish their benefits. It is no rich man's religious club. Here the poorest and the richest enjoy all the benefits of the ministration of the Word and sacraments of Jesus Christ, whether they can contribute a penny each or a thousand dollars in the offertory. It is also a free pulpit. Here great national and social questions may be handled by the preacher fearlessly and frankly. It is an advantage that the preacher himself is often a visitor, so that absolute truth without regard to its bearing upon the individual may be and is aimed at. * * *

The question is, What has been done? Well, a grand site consisting of forty-five acres has been procured and paid for. The Bethlehem Chapel of the Holy Nativity, the cradle of the Cathedral, as Bethlehem was of the Church, has been built. Two great schools, as before related, are in successful operation. A staff of six clergy is busily employed in maintaining the spiritual work of the Cathedral and in collecting funds for the completion of the project. Upwards of three million dollars have been raised. The Cathedral itself, at present prices, will cost upwards of eight million dollars, a fifth of what a modern battleship costs. A battleship goes to the scrap heap in fifteen years; cathedrals grow more beautiful each year and last through the ages. In fact, Sancta Sophia, at Constantinople, has been a place of worship, now unfortunately Mohammedan, for 1,400 years, and barring the ravages of men, will apparently endure for all time.

The actual building of the Cathedral fabric at Washington began in 1910 and proceeded more or less continuously until stopped by the great war. Operations will be resumed as soon as industrial conditions become more settled and prices more even, probably this coming autumn, and if the money comes in, will continue until the work is complete. If the funds are provided there are no structural or architectuarl reasons why the whole project could not be completed in five years. Some eight thousand people have already contributed in sums varying from a penny each to $600,000. It is hoped that with the endeavors now being made, contributions will be so general and so large that this great project can go forward rapidly.

The immediate program is to increase the membership of the National Cathedral Association to at least 100,000. The aim of this association is to give publicity to the fact and purposes of the National Cathedral; to enlist friends of the project all over the country; to hasten the building of this House of Prayer for all people by encouraging doners to make large and small gifts for the completion of the fabric; to raise $300,000 as soon as possible for the construction of the remainder of the foundations, and especially to pray to our Father in heaven for His guidance and aid in this undertaking. Local committees of the association have been organized in many parts of the country—North, South and west—and others are in process of formation. The aims of the association are sought for by the use of such means of each local committee can command.

All inquiries in regard to the Cathedral and the association should be addressed to The Dean, Washington Cathedral Offices, Mount St. Alban, Washington, D. C.

The National Cathedral affords the most appropriate place for the permanent commemoration in stone and in institutional work for the help of humanity, of the great service rendered by America and Americans in the war, and the Chapter of the Cathedral welcomes thank offerings for the men and women of America who served in the great war, whether in the army, the navy, the Marine Corps, the air service ,the Red Cross or in governmental activities of any kind, in order that they, together with the founders, fathers and saviours of our country, from George Washington onwards, may have a lasting memorial in the great House of Prayer now being builded in the capital of our nation. A Christian cathedral as a witness to Christ and a House of Prayer for all people is surely the most appropriate and the most heipful tribute that can be conceived of. Libraries, hospitals, universities, social service institutes, each can render real service to God and to humanity, but a Cathedral of great scope like that at Washington includes within its purview not only the aims of these institutions, but also the release and development of the only spiritual and effective force, the truth and grace that come from Jesus Christ, that can give men the will and the skill to make our institutions great, and to lead on the Church and the nation to high and permanent achievement for the glory of God and the help of man.

"Back to the Gospel"

W. H. Morse, M. D.

The conversion of Giovanni Papini, who is, perhaps, the greatest Italian writer of modern times, is a notable event and one that is full of promise. Described by an astute fellow-countryman as "the most characteristic representative of the ideal Italian patrimony," his indifference to religion has been the subpect of criticism both at Rome and among the Protestants. In vain have efforts been made for many years to gain his interest in religion. His brilliant articles in the Italian papers have always been heartily welcomed, and always the Roman Catholics and the Protestants have regretted his attitude toward the faith. Never a pronounced skeptic, never attacking the Vatican or the missionary efforts, he has simply observed an attitude of careless apathy.

But now a change has come. To the manifest astonishment of all, he came out in the Resto del Carlino in two articles in which he poured out his soul. The first of these described his experience. He wrote:

"Dismayed by the terrible tragedy of peoples, I have plunged headlong into the study of history. At last, finding that all the endeavors made by men to install an ephemeral happiness on earth had piteously failed, and had only succeeded in sowing tears and blood, it seemed to me that the sole escape from our misery was offered by the unheeded word of Christ. It was therefore that with a heart buoyed up with hope and love I approached the gospels. Nor was I deluded in that hope, for in the gospels I found certainty and peace. Thus, after an experience of chaos, I confess that I have returned to Christ and hope never to be separated from Him again."

His second article, in the same journal, was quite as striking:

"It is not enough," he wrote, "to change laws and forms of government. The souls of men must be changed, and this must be done without any delay. All the evils from which we are suffering come not from outside, but from within." Then, after continuing in this strain, he continued: "To change the whole face of the earth will be nothing, will help nothing, unless the soul of every one of us be renewed, remade, purified. The Kingdom of Heaven is within us. He who looks for it outside is blind, and a blind leader of the blind. There is a guide whence we might even today derive some of the principles to which we must perforce return if we do not desire to perish in the tortures of eternal despair. It is a small volume, divided into four little books, which was written eighteen or nineteen centuries ago. Everybody knows it, many read it, nobody follows it. It is called the gospel of Jesus Christ."

This pronouncement has been followed by another, from the Hon. Luigi Luzzati, one of the most eminent of Italian economists. To a large gathering of students and professors at Rome University, he urged that the economic problems of the present day should have a religious solution. Even an apparently remote question, such as that of foreign exchanges (although of such serious importance to Italy at present) cannot, he declared, be solved without a change of heart in the European nations.

More recently, speaking on the same problem, he said: "A few words from the Sermon on the Mount, rigorously applied, would in substance contain sufficient economic wisdom to solve the problem. All of the proposed solutions, though they are technical, presuppose an economic and moral uplifting of the nations that have come out of the war. The situation is such that a Francis of Assissi would be more useful to us, from the economic point of view, than either a professor of financial science or a delegate to the League of Nations. Unhappily, it is more difficult to create a saint than either of the other two!"

"Yes, indeed," says the Rev. Dr. Enrico Pons of Rome, "Italy's problem is at its root a religious problem, and many of her wisest sons recognize this fact. The Achilles' heel of our people is their lack of heart-religion, their culture that is for the most part pagan. Italian liberalism is gathering the fruits of fifty years of atheistic education. The Church is reaping the harvest of its formalism. Fundamentally, this acute crisis, political, economic, moral, is a religious crisis."

SHOULD THE CHURCH MOVE ITS HEADQUARTERS FROM NEW YORK TO WASHINGTON?

[At the last meeting of the Presiding Bishop and Council, there was presented by Dr. James E. Freeman, on behalf of the Bishop of Washington, a brief, urging the transfer of the administrative headquarters of the Church from New York to the national capital. To this brief Mr. Lewis B. Franklin replied with a statement setting forth the convictions and the reasons of those who believe that the headquarters should remain where they are. If the possibility of a transfer should be seriously considered, the ultimate determination would doubtless be shaped by the public opinion of the whole Church; and so it will be of interest to our readers to hear the arguments of the two sides.—Ed. S. C.]

Bishop Harding Says "Yes"

As the question of the future location of the headquarters of the Presiding Bishop and Council is now under consideration, I am venturing to set forth what seem to me some cogent reasons why the decision should be to choose for that purpose the city of Washington, the capital of the nation.

First, because as the political centre of the nation, of vastly increased and increasing importance since the great World War, Washington is drawing to itself daily the representative citizens of the country and of other lands. Here also are the members of the Congress and the Cabinet, and officers of the army and navy. The headquarters of the Church in Washington would be conspicuous and influential in a way not possible in any other city, not excepting the metropolis of New York.

Secondly. Other religious bodies are recognizing this fact. The Southern Methodist Episcopal Church has erected here a marble temple, representative of that communion. The Southern Presbyterians are planning a similar great church. The Baptists are building a national memorial to Roger Williams. The Presbyterians (North) are reported to be planning a central building here. In particular, this is the practical headquarters of the Roman Catholic Church. Here at the Catholic University the Bishops of that Church assemble every fall in council, and from here issue their pastoral letter. They have recently organized a Bureau of Missions, of Publicity, of Education, etc. They have had for years a Bureau of Indian Affairs, and one that keeps track of all actual and impending changes in the Federal offices. With monies derived from the last seven-fold drive in the late war, they have purchased many valuable properties, and the powerful order of the Knights of Columbus, using the same resources, are establishing night schools and buildings similar to the Y. M. C. A. More recently a National Council has been created composed of laymen, with organizations in every parish, designed to unite all their laymen in what we call Social Service work. In addition to the hundreds of acres they own in Northeast Washington, on which are the yearly increasing buildings of their University, are Trinity College for Women, the Paulist Fathers, a Monastery, many houses of Orders of Sisterhoods, and recently there has been reported the receipt of a million dollars for an Ecclesiastical Library, which is to be the greatest in America. Crowning all these is to be erected a great church costing ten millions of dollars, to be known as the National Shrine of the Blessed Virgin Mary, in which effort they are enlisting the women of their Church in the whole United States. Already the cornerstone has been laid, and building will be begun this fall. All the cement corporations have agreed to contribute whatever amount of cement is needed for the foundations. This will be in effect a cathedral, a sort of offset to our National Cathedral, the city of Washington not being a Roman See, but part of the Archdiocese of Baltimore. Nevertheless it is the potent centre of all their activities, and the Papal Ablegate lives here. To sum up, leading religious bodies have not only perceived that Washington is a strategic point for nation-wide activities, but are now acting upon this conviction.

Thirdly. Washington is neutral ground. It is the city of all Americans. It would be advantageous to the Church to have its headquarters in neutral ground. Many Bishops of the Church have expressed themselves as not only favoring such a move, but earnestly desiring it.

Fourthly. At this time it is possible to secure sufficiently large holdings of land in suitable locations at prices not prohibitive, for the erection and future extension of suitable buildings for the Church's work.

Fifthly. Washington is now a strong financial centre with banks of world-wide reputation, and connections with the great financial institutions in New York and elsewhere. All financial operations can be carried on here successfully.

Sixthly. Washington has railroad connections with the whole country, and people like to come here both for business and pleasure. Homes in desirable sections can be obtained at lower cost than in most great cities, and living expenses are no higher. The climate is delightful in the spring and fall, and the winters are milder than in the North, and hot spells in the summer seldom last more than a few days at a time, and there are very many delightful days.

The National Cathedral, now rising on Mount Saint Alban, will afford an incomparable spiritual atmosphere for the work of the Church's leaders. The churches of Washington, notably the Church of the Epiphany, which is strategically situated, will give hospitable welcome to meetings on behalf of Missions, Religious Education, Social Service, etc.

On behalf then of the clergy and people of the Diocese of Washington, I extend a hearty invitation to the Presiding Bishop and Council to make its headquarters in Washington, assuring you of our hearty co-operation in all things looking to this end, and also assuring you of our conviction that such a step will be of inestimable benefit to the Church's work.

ALFRED HARDING, Bishop of Washington.

Bishop's House, July 2, 1921.

Mr. Franklin Says "No"

Referring to the brief on behalf of Washington as headquarters for the Presiding Bishop and Council, submitted by the Bishop of Washington at the July, 1921, meeting of the Council, the first thing that occurs to me is that the brief does not make a definite suggestion as to the part of the city recommended for the headquarters.

Mount St. Albans, with its churchly atmosphere and its beautiful surroundings, would be an ideal site for any Church institution, and on account of the elevation it is very much cooler in that part of the city than in the business section. It is, however, very remote from the banks, railroad station and stores, and can only be reached by motor or by circuitous and slow street car lines, necessitating at least one transfer. In the immediate neighborhood there are no apartment houses and few dwelling houses, and if a move were to be made in the near future, it would probably be necessary for most of our staff to live several miles from headquarters. Many of the advantages of a location in Washington would seem to me to disappear if the headquarters were to be located in the business part of the city.

However, it is not so much with the advantages or disadvantages of Washington that I am concerned as with the difficulties of moving from New York. As Treasurer of the Council, I am naturally interested in the business details of the problem, and therefore approach the subject from this standpoint. My reasons for objecting to any move are as follows:

1. Present Investment. The Church Missions House, located at Twenty-second Street and Fourth Avenue, New York City, was built by private subscription in the year 1894. It stands on a lot eighty feet on Fourth Avenue by sixty feet on Twenty-second Street. The exact cost of the real estate and building is unknown, but the property is carried on our books at $414,226.84. While the building is not ideal for our present needs, it does serve the Church in a fairly efficient way as its national headquarters. For commercial purposes the building is practically valueless, and it is not likely that we would receive any return for the building itself in the case of a sale of the property. A bid for the property was recently made in the amount of $250,000.

2. Banking. While Washington has one or two fairly large banks, New York has them by the scores. With one bank and one trust company, particularly, we have had long-established relations and obtained most favorable treatment. The trust company which handles our trust funds is thoroughly familiar with every detail of them, and it will be a matter of great inconvenience and probably of additional expense to turn this matter over to any other institution. We are in almost daily communication with them as to details of the various trusts, and it is important that many of these transactions be handled in person or by telephone rather than by mail.

At certain times the society is a large borrower of money. Recently, I advised the president of one of our banks that we would need some money this summer on account of slowness of collections. Immediately he responded, "All right, I will give you a lien of credit in the amount of $300.000, to be used at your convenience on the unsecured note of the society." The possible loss of such financial support is a matter to be given serious consideration, and I believe we would be in danger of losing this support if we were to be located more than 200 miles away.

In conducting our business in all parts of the world, we are in constant need of foreign banking connections. In New York are located the principal American branches of the Chinese and Japanese banks, while the Bank of British West Africa also has a branch in this city. We are constantly doing business with these institutions. While, of course, foreign exchange transactions can be carried on in any city in the United States, it is a well-known fact that banks outside of the great centers do business with the New York banks and expect to make a profit on each transaction. There would, therefore, be additional cost in this part of our work.

3. Legal Services. For many years the firm of Davies, Auerbach & Cornell, one of the leading law firms of the United States, has attended to all of our legal requirements without ever rendering a bill for their services. The only expenses which the society is under are such expenses as are incurred by this firm. Hardly a day passes when, either by letter or telephone, we do not have some business to transact with them, and it is estimated that we have an average of twenty-five will cases in process of adjustment at all times. In this firm we have the assistance of experts who are perfectly familiar with all details required in the settlement of estates, and have full knowledge of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society and its work. It is, of course, imperative that our legal business be transacted by a firm located in the same city as our central office, as frequently it is necessary that affidavits be prepared, signed and delivered without delay. In view of the fact that the society is a New York corporation, it is advisable to have New York counsel.

4. Shipping. The Missionary Society handles a vast amount of trans-oceanic shipments. We ship well over 500 cases of goods a year to the foreign field. Facilities for making purchases of the goods needed by our missionaries are admittedly greater in New York than elsewhere. These goods are delivered without packing at the Missions House, and are there crated, banded, sealed and marked, and shipped direct to the steamer from the Missions House. Were we located outside of New York, it would be necessary to have all such goods sent to a warehouse in New York, and we would probably have to avail ourselves of the services of a shipping broker to handle all of this work. Charges for brokerage and storage would be large, to say nothing of the freight on goods which would be bought outside of New York and shipped to the warehouse.

5. Transportation. Almost all of the missionaries leaving for foreign fields must necessarily come to the Missions House for a final conference before their departure. The boats for all Latin American points and for Liberia leave from New York, and a visit to Washington would, in many cases, involve extra travel.

6. Missionary Centre. The brief in behalf of Washington speaks of the activities of certain religious bodies in making Washington a great religious centre. Despite the facts submitted, it is nevertheless true that New York is today, and probably will remain, the missionary centre of the Protestant churches in the United States. Here are located the great Central Office buildings of the Presbyterian and Methodist Boards and the headquarters of many others, with whom we are in frequent consultation and from whom we obtain much help in the prosecution of our work. The various interdenominational missionary conferences which are held from time to time are almost always held within two blocks of the Church Missions House. Other great charitable organizations, such as the General Board of Religious Education, Rockefeller Foundation, Sage Memorial, United Charities, Red Cross, Y. M. C. A., and others have their national or international headquarters here in New York.

7. Centre of Population. While neither Washington nor New York are located near the centre of population of the United States, New York City is centrally located with regard to the membership of the Episcopal Church. It is the geographical centre of a district containing nearly one-half of the congregations, more than half of the self-supporting parishes and more than three-fourths of the communicants of the Church.

8. Personnel. The Missions House staff of approximately 125 persons, including the officers, have for the most part had long training in the work. They are serving the Church, not primarily for the payment received for their services, but because they are deeply interested in the work. A very large proportion of them would not be able to sever their family ties and make new arrangements for living in Washington without a very large increase in salary. It is estimated that this salary increase alone would amount to over $25,000 per annum, in addition to which we would lose many of our most loyal and devoted co-workers, because of their inability to make the move under any circumstances.

LEWIS B. FRANKLIN, Treasurer.

By Whose Power Did Christ Rise?

E. L. G.

We recently called attention to verses in certain of our hymns which give a once common but certainly erroneous interpretation of a favorite passage in the New Testament. There is another hymn, found in the hymnal of 1871, omitted in the revision of 1892 and reappearing in the last revision, which contains a single line equally unfortunate in its implication. It is the otherwise fine old Easter hymn beginning, "Come see the place where Jesus lay," the second verse of which contains these lines:

"O joyful sound! O glorious hour,
When by His own Almighty power
He rose and left the grave!"

Of course it was Christ who rose from the dead, as we confess in the Creed. But with singular emphasis the apostles testify that He was raised by the power and will of God the Father. "Whom God hath raised up." "God, that raised Him from the dead." "Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father." 'Who was raised for our justification." No less than thirty times is this explicitly stated, and never, unless once in the form of a parable, is it said that Christ raised Himself.

It is a matter of no little significance when considered in connection with the death of Christ for our redemption. "He died for us." "Christ died for our sins." With a fulness of meaning that eludes our perfect apprehension, this is true. The utter reality of that death for sin is best understood by the cry wrung from His soul in the thick darkness of the cross; "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" How perfectly and humanly He became "obedient unto death" is shown by His last words: "Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit!" He "who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree" committed both Himself and His cause "to Him who judgeth righteously." Did the sacrifice avail? Had propitiation been made, and were sin and death overcome? It was not for Jesus, but for "God, the Judge of all," to make answer and Himself to attest the fact in the most significant and incontestable manner possible. And this He did, both for Jesus and for all for whom Jesus suffered death, when He raised Him from the dead, "having loosed the pangs of death; because it was not possible for Him to be holden of it" since the power of sin and death, under which Jesus had died, was in His death broken and destroyed. Thus the Father set His seal of acceptance and finality upon the finished work of His Son, and gave to His people the assurance of forgiveness and life and victory in the Christ, when He raised Him from the dead and gave Him glory.

As we think of it we simply cannot imagine our Lord, having so "emptied Himself" as to become man and obedient unto death, grasping again "His own Almighty power," as though in impatience or distrust, and seizing upon His own vindication. "Wherefore also God highly exalted Him, and gave unto Him the name which is above every name."

To compare our frail humanity with all the hosts of the starry heavens is to emphasize our weakness. "What is man?" That is the material view. The Bible view is that man is made in the image of God. For a limited time he is lower than the angels, ultimately to be crowned with glory and honor. The fact of his affinity for and his fellowship with God raises him to a place apart. The image is moral; the power, a free will; the destiny, the beatific vision in the paradise of God.—Bishop Ferris.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

This is a subject about which we hear and read so much that we weary of it. It is indeed a tiresome topic, but that does not detract from its importance.

It means food, clothing, shelter, if it is solved, to thousands of people here in our own beloved country. It is well worth conferring about and trying to solve.

It is almost impossible for the average person who is not a laborer to realize what idleness means. Suppose your salary or your entire income were cut off altogether for two or three months. How many of us could stand such a dislocation of our finances?

This is just what is happening to some three million men in our country today, and it will require the utmost efficiency in co-operation among relief organizations to keep people from starving during the coming winter. It will not do to have any overlapping or duplication of effort, or the consequences will be disastrous. It is not a matter of ease or comfort, but of life and death.

WHO IS WATCHING YOU?

The writer has a friend whose outlook on life is very circumscribed; indeed, it only includes about thirty feet of a city street.

She is an old lady confined to her room, which is in the third floor back of a large city house. As she can only see ten yards or so of street, she gives it closer attention than she would if she had more of the world to feast her eyes upon.

It is a paradox of life that very often those who cannot see very much see more than those who see a great deal, because they think upon what they do see and absorb the full significance of things that are only a passing incident to others.

People who pass through life in a self-centered atmosphere who are not alert to what is going on around them, are those of whom our Saviour said, "Eyes have they and see not, and they have ears, but do not hear." There are thousands of such people who only half live, because they are so busy thinking about their own affairs, wondering how this real estate deal will turn out, or whether they can't get a little more money out of that piece of property, or something of that sort, that they entirely miss many of the little things of life.

It isn't always the men of business who are guilty of this abstraction in their own affairs either, for it may be what to put into next Sunday's sermon that keeps us from seeing our brother's need.

One sometimes wonders if it wasn't this sort of self-concentration that caused the priest and the Levite to "pass by on the other side," heedless of the suffering of that bleeding and wounded traveler on the Jericho road upon the occasion which has made a certain Samaritan so famous as the first apostle of Christian social service.

But let us get back to our old lady in her third-story back bedroom, observing the thirty feet of street, which is all of the great world that she can see. One day she noticed a group of street-sweepers with their long-handled, stiff-bristled brushes pushing the dirt in the gutter into tidy piles to be hauled away by another division of city cleaners, who would toss these same piles into their carts as they came along.

While these municipal house-cleaners were working in their overalls at this somewhat menial task, a band of gaily and fashionably dressed young girls passed on the sidewalk. They were chattering and laughing, as such bright young things full of life and good spirits are wont to do.

Suddenly a look of recognition flashed across the face of one of these gay maidens, and she stepped off the sidewalk into the street with an extended hand and a smile to greet cordially one of the sweepers, who was evidently an old acquaintance. The man thus recognized took off his hat and put forth a rough, hard hand that was none too clean, with a look of gratified pleasure that was so unmistakable that it reached to the third floor back window where our quiet observer sat.

After a cheerful greeting and a few friendly words this pretty damsel rejoined her companions and the gay group passed on up the street and out of the world of the watcher at the window into the universe of the great outside. But the rough laborer leaned upon his brush and looked after this bright, beautiful person with a look of pleasure on his face that lingered like the rays in a sunset sky after the great orb that produced them has passed out of sight.

It was a pleasant little drama that was played there upon that thirty feet of the stage of life to the audience of one. It was only a little act of kindness performed there in the quiet street upon the impulse of the moment without any intention of making an impression upon a great multitude of people, yet that one keen, unseen witness saw it, and felt its beauty and significance, and related it to the writer of this page, who now passes it on to our ten thousand or more readers, so that we see that that little Christian deed was unwittingly performed in the sight of a great concourse of people more numerous than many church congregations; and who knows, perhaps its rehearsal here will, by God's grace and help, inspire others, many others, to similar little thoughtful expressions of Christian kindliness. This little incident shows us how far-reaching may be our thoughtless acts.

No one can estimate the value of yielding to a good impulse that produces the bestowal of a little Christian love upon another. It influences the lives of both the giver and the recipient, and a great throng of unseen observers.

Its effect, however, by no means ceases with its consequences upon the lives in this world, for who shall say that it is not just these things that form the material of the future home of our souls?

When our Saviour gave us that blessed assurance that "in My Father's house are many mansions," He implied, too, that that house would be large enough for each one of us to find therein a separate room which it would be our privilege to furnish, and is it not an inspiringly helpful thought that every time we think a loving thought we hang a beautiful picture upon the wall of that room in our Father's house; and when we let that loving thought grow into a friendly greeting (like that recorded here), we put a handsome rug upon the floor of that room; and when we encourage those considerate thoughts and kindly words to grow to their natural fruition in unselfish deeds, then are we adding useful furniture to our room.

After all, is not Christian social service the constant furnishing of the future habitation of our souls?

A final and greatest consideration of all is that some day we shall entertain in this little home of our souls an Honored Guest, for does He not tell us that He stands at the door and knocks, and that if we will open unto Him, He will come in and sup with us, and dwell with us in a "mystic sweet communion"?

Sometimes as I go about the doubt arises whether the commendable willingness of a clergyman to care for the parish property, even to paint the building, make the furnace fire, and mow the church lawn, may not be depriving laymen of practical opportunities of service, and may not tend to confuse certain minds as to the true work of a priest. Undoubtedly he is right in not being fastidious and aloof from material needs; yet the apostles, when the right time came, pointed out the danger of over-much serving of tables.—Bishop B. Brewster.

Opening of the DuBose Memorial Church Training School.

In the beautiful Chapter of the Holy Comforter, on the grounds of the school, at Monteagle, Tenn., were held the opening exercises of this new institution, which has come into being in response to the dire need for a ministry for rural and general mission work.

The Rev. W. M. DuBose first addressed the friends of the school, gathered in such numbers as to fill the chapel to overflowing, on "The Inception of the School," calling attention to the necessity, precedents for and advantages of this training school, paying a tribute to Mr. Claiborne in passing, and ending with a prayer for a blessing on the work just beginning.

Bishop Green, of Mississippi, spoke on the "Organization of the School," calling attention to the system of education and culture of which this is the latest branch, other institutions connected with it being St. Andrew's School, St. Mary's-on-the-Mountain, the Emerald-Hodgson Hospital, and other establishments for the furtherance of religion, health and knowledge in the mission field. He stressed the fact that this school will not clash with existing institutions for the training of clergy, but rather aid and supplement them in its special department. He spoke of the fitness of this memomial to the beloved Dr. W. P. DuBose.

Bishop Green also read a few of the many telegrams and letters bearing good wishes and congratulations on the opening of the new institution.

Mr. W. A. Sadd, president of the Chattanooga Savings Bank, and president of the Board of Trustees of the school, spoke feelingly, from a layman's standpoint, of fifteen years' realization of the need for more clergy, especially trained to take care of missions, rural and suburban churches and missions.

Bishop Knight's address was brief, and he made a special trip, leaving other important duties, to speak at this opening.

The Rev. Mercer P. Logan delivered his inaugural address, giving an outline of his own missionary experience in several localities, paying tribute to Mr. Claiborne, who has done so much in his particular field—the mountain districts—and to others who have been instrumental in advancing the work of the Church.

The Holy Communion was celebrated by the Rt. Rev. William Mercer Green.

Music for the service was in charge of Miss Gladys Fry, of New Orleans.

After the service an informal luncheon was served outdoors, under the beautiful trees of the campus, to all assembled for the opening.

During and after luncheon some informal talks and announcements were made, various old friends of the school being called on to speak.

There are thirty applicants for admission to the school, which was planned to accommodate twelve or fifteen. These men are of the best type, successful in secular endeavor, and give promise of having more than usual ability for the ministry.

Episcopal Theological School.

Important changes in the curriculum of the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass., under which students are permitted to elect a majority of their courses, were announced on September 26 by the dean, the Rev. Dr. Henry Bradford Washburn, in connection with the opening of the fifty-fifth academic year.

Registrations indicate that there will be more than twenty students in residence at the school this year, a resident enrollment twice as large as that of last year.

The new curriculum makes possible a greater use of the facilities of Harvard University with which the Episcopal School is affiliated, and gives its students the fullest opportunity, in the words of President Lowell, of Harvard, "to know everything about something and something about everything."

Hobart College.

With the largest enrollment and the largest entering class in its history, Hobart College opened formally on Friday afternoon, September 23, when Dr. Bartlett and Dean Durfee welcomed the old men and the new. Also, the hundredth year of Hobart's history opened at the same time.

All records are smashed, as it was hoped they would be, not only for enrollment, but for new men entering. The Centennial year opens with every omen favorable. The Hobart corporation is now directing and the Hobart faculty is teaching by far the largest number of students ever.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Getting in Touch with "Scattered Communicants."

The Bishop is most anxious to get in touch with all "scattered communicants" in the Diocese. The idea is this: There are in this Diocese numbers of persons who are members of the Episcopal Church or definitely interested in the Church, and yet are so situated that it is impossible for them to be connected with any regularly organized congregation. It may be that some are located in places where they are too far removed from any Episcopal Church to attend services. Undoubtedly there are many such persons in these thirty-two counties. Others there may be the nature and hours of whose work are such as to retard and to a certain extent discourage their Church life. The Bishop wishes to offset these disadvantages and to bring all of these persons into intimate contact with the life of the active, working Church in this Diocese, hoping to achieve this end through personal letters, Church papers and literature of various kinds and by other methods that will develop from time to time. The first step necessary is to obtain the names and address of these members and friends of the Church. Assistance is asked of the persons themselves or any acquaintances of theirs who may learn of this movement that is being inaugurated. The Bishop earnestly desires this information and will sincerely appreciate the aid of those who will furnish it, whoever they may be. Correspondence in this connection should be addressed to the Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, Box 1068, Roanoke, Va.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

N.-W. C. Mission Services.

Mission services, preparatory to the Nation-Wide Campaign, will be held in the Diocese from October 16 to 19 at four churches, each of which will be the mission church for a certain section of the city. In this way neighboring parishes will work together, and all will have an opportunity to attend the services. The churches in Group I will attend the mission at Epiphany Church, and the missioner there will be the Rt. Rev. T. D. Bratton, Bishop of Mississippi. Services for Group II will be held at Christ Church, Georgetown, for which the missioner will be the Rev. Walter Mitchell, D. D., chaplain, Porter Military Academy, Charleston, S. C. The Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, Va., will be the preacher for the mission held at St. Stephen's Church, where services will be held for Group III. Group IV will go to St. Mark's Church, and their missioner will be Rev. Robert A. Seilhamer, D. D., Pawtucket, R. I.

The missions open on Sunday night, October 16, and continue through October 19.

For the Junior Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

The Parish Guild of St. Andrew's Church made doughnuts on Tuesday, October 4, and the proceeds of their sale will be used to send delegates from the Junior Brotherhood to the convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in Norfolk, Va. The women of St. Andrew's Parish have made doughnuts everey Tuesday during the winter for several years, thereby reducing the church debt materially.

The Sunday School Institute of the Diocese of Washington will be held on Wednesday, October 19, at Epiphany Parish Hall.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Coadjutor.

Council of Colored Churchmen.

The twelfth annual Council for the Colored Churchmen of the Diocese convened in the Church of the Epiphany, Summerville, September 21-22, opening with the celebration of the Holy Communion and a sermon by the Rt. Rev. William A. Guerry, D. D.

The Bishop in his sermon stressed the importance of the missionary work of the Church, and urged the clergy and delegates to adopt the Church's program for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Church and the Jubilee of the Woman's Auxiliary.

The Bishop was assisted in this service by the Rt. Rev. H. B. Delany, D. D., Bishop Suffragan of North Carolina; Archdeacon Baskervill and the Rev. John B. Elliott.

Immediately after this service the Council went into organization, and Bishop Delany read his annual report to the Council, which was a review of the visits made by him in our Diocese during the past year. The Bishop's report was inspiring and encouraging, and showed that progress was being made throughout the Archdeaconry both numerically and financially.

Throughout the Council subjects of deep and vital interest to the growth of the Church and the religious development of the people were discussed by the clergy and laity.

In the afternoon of the first day of the Council, Archdeacon Baskervill made his annual report before the Council, in which he said "that during these days of lawlessness and mob violence our Christian responsibility is tremendous and imperative. We must stand up as Christian heroes for righteousness and peace. There is no place for retreat or surrender. . . .

"Brethren of the clergy, I strongly beg you not to become discouraged at occasional disturbances between the races. As ministers of the gospel of Jesus Christ, we are not to be pessimists, but optimists. We are not to be preachers of strife and hatred, but preachers of righteousness, of love and peace on the basis of the religion of Christ."

The Bishop of the Diocese spoke in glowing terms of the Archdeacon's address and offered the following resolution:

"We, the clergy and laity of the Colored Council of the Diocese of South Carolina, wish to express our very deep and heartfelt appreciation of the generous gifts received from friends of the colored work both within and without the Diocese.

We desire to place on record our unqualified endorsement of the splendid work of our devoted Archdeacon. His labors in the Master's service are worthy of all praise, and we pray God's richest blessings upon his work and pledge him our unbounded support."

On the afternoon of the second day the Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of the Diocese, delivered a stirring address on the Nation-Wide Campaign, which was well received.

The Council closed with a special service on Thursday, at which time the Rev. M. A. Hollins, of the A. M. E. Church; the Rev. A. W. Ambler, rector of St. Paul's Church, Summerville, and Bishop Guerry delivered convincing addresses.

The Woman's Auxiliary held its annual meeting at the same time as the Council, and the reports showed marked progress in the work. Mrs. William P. Cornell, President of the White Branch, delivered an interesting address at the meeting.

ATLANTA.

Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop.

Preaching Mission.

A most successful mission came to a close Sunday, September 11. It was under the direction of the Church of the Holy Comforter, one of the smaller churches of Atlanta, with the Rev. G. W. Gasque, rector, as the preacher.

The mission was conducted in a big tent located on one of the principal streets near the center of the parish, not far from the church. It was well advertised over a territory of more than two thousand population.

The first service was addressed by the Rev. William A. Lee, D. D., student secretary of the Georgia Y. M. C. A. Other addresses were made by Mayor Key, Professor W. A. Sutton, City Superintendent of Schools; Dr. C. B. Wilmer, rector of St. Luke's Church, and others. At the closing meeting the Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop of Atlanta, was the preacher.

The attendance at all the services was exceptionally good. Especially was this true of the Sunday night services. Several ministers of other denominations were in attendance.

With the exception of the second Sunday night, the meetings were informal. The Prayer Books from the church were brought to the tent and distributed at nearly every service. In hundreds of cases this was the first time that they had ever seen a Prayer Book, and a few asked for a copy to take home with them.

On the second Sunday night the regular evening service was carried out with the minister and vested choir. It was astonishing how heartily the people of all denominations entered into the service.

Of the many results of the mission one was the breaking down of a great deal of prejudice against the Church held by hundreds in the community who knew little or nothing of the Episcopal Church. Mr. Gasque, being very tolerant himself, and extremely tactful in all that he said, hundreds of friends were made for the Church. He received several invitations to preach in other churches in the city.

NEWARK

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor

Four bequests to the Diocese of Newark have just now been announced: Mr. DeWitt Cook, the late Senior Warden of Christ Church, East Orange, has left $10,000 to his parish church; $5,000 to St. Barnabas' Hospital, and $5,000 for the Diocesan House. Mr. Rudolph Levi, beside remembering his synagogue and the Hebrew Home for the Aged, has left $1,000 for St. Barnabas' Hospital.

Several big building projects are being carried out: a new rectory for Trinity Cathedral Church, Newark; a new chapel at Lincoln Park; a new church at Woodcliff, on the Palisades.

The Diocesan Church Extension Fund, with subscriptions of one dollar or more from about four hundred persons, to be paid in response to calls from the Bishops and Board of Diocesan Missions five times in the year, has recently made possible the building of the churches at Woodcliff and Lincoln Park. It has helped toward the purchase of rectories at Oradell, Ramsey, St. George's, Passaic, and Westwood, and the purchase of land at Mountain Lakes and Fort Lee. This Bishop's Church Extension Fund has gone on steadily through many years and has made possible fifty or sixty needed church buildings.

TENNESSEE

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gailor, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. Troy Beatty, D. D., Coadjutor.

Dr. Phillips Accepts Call to Columbia, S. C.

The Rev. Henry D. Phillips, D. D., chaplain of the University of the South, Sewanee, Tenn., and Professor of English Bible in the same, has accepted a call to become rector of Trinity Church, Columbia, S. C., and will enter upon his new duties January 1, 1922.

Dr. Phillips, who is the son-in-law of Bishop Reese, of Georgia, is a graduate of the University of the South. The honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by Oglethorpe University, Atlanta, in 1920. Upon his graduation in 1906 Dr. Phillips founded the Church Settlement and Training School for Settlement Workers at LaGrange, Ga., and remained in that work, which he made eminently successful, until September, 1915, when he became chaplain of Sewanee. He has been very successful in his work with the students.

The Rt. Rev. Troy Beatty, D. D., will be in residence at Nashville, Tenn., after October 1, 1921.

The Rev. J. M. Maxon, rector of Christ Church, Nashville, Tenn., has been elected president of the local Ministerial Union, as a tribute to the efficient work he has done, not only as rector of Christ Church, but in prison reform and other social work.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

Fiftieth Anniversary Observed.

The fiftieth anniversary of Trinity Church, Chambersburg, the Rev. Harvey P. Marks, rector, was observed on Sunday and Monday, September 26-27. The Rev. Francis C. Woodard, a former rector, preached at the services, and Mr. Thomas J. Brereton read a carefully prepared and complete history of the parish. Monday was signalized by the meeting of the Archdeaconry of Harrisburg, which took advantage of the occasion for its meeting. At the evening service addresses were made by Rev. Mr. Woodard, Rev. Dr. Swentzel, of St. Luke's, Brooklyn, who was rector there about forty years ago, and who left that parish for St. Luke's, Scranton, and in the absence of Judge Gillan, the minister of the Reformed Church, spoke, conveying the good feeling of the Christian people of the city to the congregation of Trinity Church. Bishop Darlington made the final address.

Addresses were also made by Archdeacon Dorwart and the Rev. Mr. Robinson, secretary of the Archdeaconry, and Executive Secretary Judd.

PITTSBURGH

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Church Normal School.

An innovation in the Diocese is the inauguration of a Church Normal School, under the leadership of Miss Charlotte F. Forsyth, Diocesan Superintendent of Religious Education. The aim of the school is to help those who are teaching in the Sunday schools, and those interested in preparing themselves to teach. The schedule provides for two terms of five weeks each, the first term during October and November and the second term during January and February. Each term will consist of five intensive sessions on five evenings of successive weeks, to be held in two centres, that together will cover the territory fairly well, Calvary, Pittsbugh, and Christ Church, North Side, on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings. The program will be divided into periods, the first covering opening devotions and instructions in the principles of teaching for all enrolled, and the second period will be devoted to grade conferences and superintendents' conferences.

Conference on Nation-Wide Campaign Program.

The September meeting of the Clerical Union was held in Calvary Church and Parish House, Pittsburgh, on September 19, in conjunction with a conference on the Nation-Wide Campaign program for the year 1921-2, conducted by the Rev. L. G. Wood, one of the field secretaries of the Presiding Bishop and Council. The Bishop and about thirty-five of the clergy were in attendance, and the meeting was a most helpful and successful gathering.

The Pittsburgh Assembly of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew held its autumnal meeting at Christ Church, Pittsburgh, on Thursday evening, September 22, beginning with shortened Evening Prayer, followed by supper in the parish house. In the evening an address was made by the Rev. A. Whitfield Cheatham, the new rector of St. Stephen's Church, McKeesport.

A meeting of diocesan and parochial officers of the Woman's Auxiliary was held on September 23 at the country home of the president, Mrs. Charles Baily, at Oakmont. There were ninety-four delegates in attendance, and the meeting was characterized by much interest and enthusiasm. Plans were made for the winter's work, and all the personal boxes in the diocesan allotment from New York were placed. Plans are also under consideration for the observance of the fiftieth anniversary of the Auxiliary in October, and envelopes are being distributed for the ingathering in behalf of the Emery Fund. The money required for the erection of the Mrs. Ormsby Phillips Memorial House for Dr. James and other women doctors in China has been furnished, and the Auxiliary is now making preparations for the furnishing of the house.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor.

Trinity Parish, Portsmouth.

Sixty five of the leading men of the business, professional and city government, the presidents of the Rotary and Kiwanis Clubs, the director of the Y. M. C. A., together with the clergy of every denomination in the city, were present at a banquet served on Friday, September 23, in the parish house by the ladies of the church, to the new rector of Trinity Parish, the Rev. C. H. Holmead. The Rev. Dr. William A. Brown, rector of St. John's Church, Portsmouth, was the toastmaster. The new rector was presented by Mr. J. Davis Reed, Senior Warden of the parish. Two former rectors were present and greeted him, the Rev. Newton Middleton, now of Norfolk, and the Bishop Coadjutor of the Diocese, Dr. Thomson. Among those extending felicitations to the new rector were the Rev. Father Joseph Magri, of St. Paul's Roman Catholic Church, and Rabbi G. J. Bacaret, of the Jewish Church, together with the pastors of the Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational Churches. The Rev. Dr. Covington, of Old St Paul's, Norfolk, brought greetings from the See city of the Diocese. The new rector responded to the greetings, a good musical program was given, and thus passed into history one of the most memorable instances in this historic parish, which dates from 1761.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan-Elect.

Helping the Unemployed.

Old St. Mark's, in the Bowery, is leading all other New York churches in a bread line for the unemployed. About one hundred and fifty per day, two meals, are now being fed. Many of these men are former service men. At one employment bureau nearby ninety-eight jobs were secured in one day. A weather strip firm, fitting up houses for the winter, offers employment, but maintains it can get few men. The work is not difficult, but is somewhat dangerous.

A proposition is now made, and likely to be acted on favorably, to use $200,000 raised two years ago as a start toward the erection of a memorial hall, to give employment to service men now out of work. According to the charity societies, conditions in New York are not quite as bad yet as they were in 1914. In August of that year, and of 1915 almost 3,000 families were under care of the societies. This past August the number was 1,951. The New York authorities warn that the winter months may vastly increase the number. It is stated that war wages have made possible considerable savings, so that if one member of a family is out of work, suffering does not follow.

Investigation of restaurant charges made lately reveal profits of 200 per cent. For example, eating places that used to furnish a common sandwich for five cents were found to be charging fifteen cents for the same, or smaller. A few of the great eating places in the financial district, some of which fed five to eight thousand persons each noon, have reduced to the five-cent level again, due in part to pressure that has been exerted through publicity.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Coadjutor.

Meeting of Convocation.

The autumn meeting of the Northwestern Convocation in the Diocese was held in Grace Church, Elkins, the Rev. E. Nelson Maconomy, rector, September 27-29. The opening service took place on Tuesday evening, when the Rev. James L. Fish, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Wheeling, preached. The dean, Rev. R. E. L. Strider, rector of St. Matthew's Church, Wheeling, was indisposed and unable to be present, and Bishop Gravatt, at the request of the members, presided at the meeting on Wednesday morning, and the following sessions of the Convocation. The best interests of the Nation-Wide Campaign were discussed, and the outlook was considered encouraging, though the fact was recognized that there is still much to be done during the remaining portion of the year. Following this meeting a service was held, with sermon by the Rev. J. T. Carter, rector of Christ Church, Clarksburg, which was followed by celebration of Holy Communion, Bishop Gravatt being the celebrant, assisted by the Rev. W. Meade, of Trinity Church, Moundsville. Luncheon was served at 12:30. Mr. Maconomy had very thoughtfully invited the ministers of other churches in town to join the members of the Convocation at lunch, and after all had partaken of the excellent things served by the ladies, the visitors and others present were given opportunity to offer expressions of good will and their views on various matters affecting the Church life of all. A business session was held in the afternoon, and after some matters continued from the morning had been disposed of, the Rev. Guy H. Crook, rector of Christ Church, Williamstown, who had been appointed essayist, read a paper on Church History. After Evening Prayer an address was given by the president of Davis-Elkins College, Elkins, Mr. James Edward Allen, his subject being, "The Church's Debt to Education." The business session on Thursday morning was occupied principally in the consideration of the best way to reach certain outlying portions of the territory within the bounds of the Convocation. Several of the rectors present undertook to do some missionary work in the districts mentioned by the Bishop. The Bishop was glad to report that all the organized parishes in the Diocese were supplied. Morning Prayer was read, and the Rev. John S. Alfriend, rector of St. Paul's Church, Weston, preached. The rector and vestry and the ladies of the church received the thanks of the members of the Convocation for the ample provision and most satisfactory arrangements they had made for the meeting of Convocation.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

A Diocesan Institute for instructing leaders for holding parish conferences was held in Savannah September 27 and 28, conducted by the Rev. Louis G. Wood, field secretary, this marking the opening of the fall activities in the Diocese for the Nation-Wide Campaign. Ten clergy, appointed by the Bishop, attended the institute, and beginning the first week in October, will hold conferences in thirty-five parishes and missions, allowing two days for each place.

St. Paul's Church, Augusta (the Rev. G. Sherwood Whitney, rector), feels great happiness over the announcement made recently that Mr. Claude M. Hobart will enter a theological seminary as a candidate for Holy Orders. Mr. Hobart has a wife and four children, who will live with him at the DuBose Memorial School, Monteagle, Tenn., where he will take his training.

St. Paul's has organized its Sunday school along the lines worked out by the Department of Religious Education. On the second Sunday in September the rector held a service adapted to the children, and gave an address on the subject of "School Time."

Section B of the Woman's Auxiliary of this parish, at its first fall meeting, heard a report of the money expended during the year, and for a young branch it made a remarkable showing. All of the money came from personal offerings of the members. The Bishop Elliott Society has voted an offering of $25 toward the support of a child in the Children's Home, in memory of Mrs. Estelle Hollingsworth, who organized the society and founded the Home.

ASHEVILLE

Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

The Ashe County Missions have been fortunate in hearing recently the Rev. John H. Griffith, Archdeacon of Asheville, who, by his forceful sermons, has caused the mountaineers to be aroused to thoughts of higher things as seldom before, and crowds have been to hear him, denominational lines obliterated.

Last year the Archdeacon had several most helpful missions in the Ashe group of stations, and, promising to return this year, he has held a service, with sermon at St. Mary's, Beaver Creek; Holy Trinity, Glendale Springs; the Jefferson and West Jefferson stations; and at St. Matthew's Church, Todd, two sermons, all powerful appeals to lead the better life. The congregations were large, the itinerary extending over a period of five days, beginning the fifteenth Sunday after Trinity, and much good is bound to result from such preaching.

At West Jefferson the Baptist Church building was kindly loaned him. At Jefferson he preached in the Methodist Church building to the Jefferson High School, a promising young institution of learning under the auspices of the Methodist Church, this at the earnest request of Principal Scott, of the school.

LOS ANGELES.

Rt. Rev. Joseph H. Johnson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. B. Stevens, Ph. D., Coadjutor.

The work of the Seamen's Church Institute at the Port of Los Angeles is progressing satisfactorily under the national organizing secretary, the Rev. William Weston. It is hoped that the renovated building may be opened within two or three months. The increase in shipping makes such a work an immediate necessity.

A joint meeting of members of the Social Service Commission of Los Angeles and Arizona was held on Tuesday, September 13. Bishop Stevens and Bishop Atwood, the chairmen of the two diocesan commissions, and a number of clerical and lay members were present. The Rev. T. C. Marshall, the chairman of the Los Angeles Commission, presided, and the Rev. H. C. Smith, chairman of the Arizona Commission, told of the work and ideals of his committee.

Trinity Church, Los Angeles, the Rev. A. F. Randall, rector, was robbed on August 12. Communion wine, money and a large electric fan were stolen. The furniture of the church was considerably damaged.

The Convocation of Los Angeles held a picnic at Newport Beach on Tuesday, August 23. Visitors were present from various parts of Southern California. The "master of ceremonies" was Bishop Sanford, of San Joaquin. Addresses were made by the Rev. Messrs. T. C. Marshall, A. G. H. Bode, J. A. Evans and J. D. H. Browne.

A Conference for Sunday School Teachers.

A conference for the teachers of the Sunday schools of San Antonio was held in St. Mark's Parish House September 19 to 23 inclusive. Those who are qualified to judge pronounce it a great success. The attendance averaged sixty and the enthusiasm was unusual.

Miss Edna McNeil, assistant superintendent of St. Mark's School, deserves much of the credit in that the plan originated with her, and she gave of her time and interest abundantly towards carrying it out. All the clergymen in charge of parishes in the city were consulted and promised co-operation. It was this community interest and work that enabled the promoters to carry out the plans.

Each evening at 6 o'clock a supper was served in the Parish House, for which a charge of 20 cents was made. These suppers were in charge of different organizations of St. Mark's Parish —the Mothers' Club, the Girls' Friendly Society, the Daughters of the King, the Parish Aid Society, and St. Margaret's Guild. At exactly 6:45 a devotional service of fifteen minutes was held. A few verses of a hymn were followed by prayer and a short address. On Monday the Rev. S. Arthur Huston, rector of St. Mark's Church, spoke on the Teacher; on Tuesday Bishop Johnston gave a story illustrating the sowing of the right kind of seed in the right way; on Wednesday Bishop Capers gave an excellent talk on Consecration; the Rev. Benjamin Bean, in charge of St. Luke's and St. John's Churches, spoke on Prayer at the Thursday service, and on Friday the Rev. L. B. Richards, rector of Christ Church, gave a most helpful talk on teaching children to worship.

Promptly at 7 o'clock the classes began. There were fourteen of them, taught by experienced teachers in the different parishes. At 7:45 the bell rang for a return to the assembly-rooms, where appropriate music for the different grades in the school was sung. The meeting was closed each evening with a benediction pronounced by one of the clergy. At the end of the last session those who had been attending the conference were entertained with a children's party by the Kempsonian Society, the young people's organization of St. Mark's Parish. It is hoped that the conference will become an annual affair and take the place of the periodical group meetings for instruction which have been held in the past.

An Unusual Service.

One of the most interesting and unusual services ever held in the Diocese of Michigan will occur on Sunday evening, October 9, in St. Paul's Cathedral, when twenty laymen of the Diocese, who have been training for the past several months in lay reading, will be definitely set apart by the Church to carry on their reading work in the churches of the Diocese, in addition to their regular secular occupations. The service will be in charge of Bishop Charles D. Williams, assisted by the Dean of the Cathedral and the Archdeacons of the Diocese.

The Lay Readers' League was formed under the auspices of the Church Club several months ago, and a course of study for the men who were willing to help the work of the Church in holding services at missions and out-of-the-way places where there were no clergy, was laid out. A number of instructors, including the Rev. Messrs. H. K. Bartow, C. L. Ramsey, Warren L. Rogers, W. N. Washington and Mr. Francis MacKay, director of the Cathedral choir, were secured to give the instruction.

During the summer months the lay readers held services under the direction of the various Archdeacons, and in many places relieving the regular clergy for their vacations.

A Remarkable Deanery Meeting: A Lynching Prevented.

The Rev. J. J. Dixon, dean of the Bighorne, asked the Rev. William H. Haupt, of Lovell, to join him at Basin, from whence in a Ford they went to Thermopolis to assist the Rev. H. H. Daniels in a harvest festival in St. Andrew's Church. The church was packed, and after a well rendered choral Evensong, the dean preached the sermon.

The following morning, Thursday, September 23, the three drove across to Meeteetse, eighty-five miles, reaching there at 4 P. M. On the way they stopped at a ranch on Gooseberry Creek, where Mr. Haupt had spent a night on his trip across the State five years ago, that Mr. Haupt might pay his respects to a very aged couple who had at that time entertained him. The old man had died and his widow removed, but he found a child whom Mr. Daniels had baptized on one of his trips to the oil fields, so Mr. Daniels renewed the acquaintance and reported the family to the rector of Park County on our arrival at Meeteetse.

St. Andrew's, Meeteetse, was well filled for the service, which was read and sung by the rector and Mr. Daniels, with Mr. Haupt at the organ, the dean preaching the sermon. The clergy then adjourned to a room in the hotel, and were just beginning a discussion of their problems when there was heard a great cry, "Help. Murder. They're killing me; help." Rushing to the street, we found a great commotion and a crowd collecting, and, a man screaming as above. Some one said, They are killing the professor, and we rushed to his rescue, thinking perhaps the school teacher had gotten in bad. Mr. Haupt, rushing up to the men, said, "What is the trouble here?" A young man poked a gun in Mr. Haupt's face and said, "You keep out of this. I'm taking this fellow to make him confess before my wife, and then I am going to take him out and shoot him. All of you keep back and out of this." We found it was a fakir and fortune-teller who had made the town, and that he had not only insulted many girls and women, but had committed all manner of crimes. The law does not provide a just punishment for such characters, but we could not allow this young man to carry out his threat and bear such a memory all his life. Mr. Daniels had married this young man and woman a few months ago, and it was mainly through his efforts with that of the young officer that finally he was induced to hand over his gun and allow the crook to be returned to jail.

The dean, the rector, Mr. Daniels and Mr. Haupt appealed to the crowd to let the law take its course, and their plea prevailed. But we could not but thank God that Meeteetse had no saloon, nor was any liquor available, for in that case nothing would have saved the disgrace of a lynching. When the crowd had dispersed the under-sheriff slipped off to Cody with the prisoner and lodged him in the county jail.

At 7 A. M. Friday Mr. Haupt, assisted by the rector, celebrated the Holy Communion, and the dean drove them to Basin so they might get home for their Friday parish services.

Except for the unhappy incident, this was a most unique and helpful deanery meeting. And many of the Meeteetse people said that if it had not been for the clergy the lynching could not have been prevented, and we felt that God had guided the dean in planning out this very thing, and to Him be the glory given for His grace.

The weather was ideal and the roads dry, although much cut up and bumpy in spots. As the park is closed the roads are being graded, and that made some hard driving. Nearly 250 miles by auto from Wednesday noon to Friday noon across almost mountains and valleys, up and down canyons, from

To greet the opal-crested dawn
A lonely cock the silence thrills,
As though the fleeting years were naught
And Peter wept 'mid Judah's hills.

If o'er the Master's patient face
A shadow passed for Peter's sake,
May I not trust His tender love
This faithless heart of mine to take?

PART I.

The Fitch family found for themselves, as thousands of other families have discovered, that what was a good salary and even a degree of luxury two decades back was far removed from affluence when the great war ended. Mr. Fitch had the same comfortable salary he had enjoyed before the war, but he was inclined to call it uncomfortable as he pinched and turned to make ends meet, while Mrs. Fitch was sure the gray hairs were rapidly multiplying for her as she did her own work and saved in every way possible. In the old days the washing and ironing had been put out, the cleaning done by a woman who came by the day, and there was a faithful "hired girl" in the kitchen, but everything was changed. The faithful hired girl was forelady in a factory at a salary that made Mrs. Fitch rejoice with her, even though she sighed for the old days when help was possible, and the woman by the day was now hiring her own work done if it was possible to coax any one to do it, while the washerwoman was running a restaurant for a big manufacturing plant and "making a nice thing of it," to quote her own words.

But one thing had not changed through the changing years, and that was the habit of friends and relatives dropping in to stay for a meal or a few days. The Fitch children, Bob, the soldier son; Marjorie, the young lady daughter who held a responsible and lucrative position in the bank, as the newspaper put it, and even seventeen-year-old Nell still retained their intimate associates, while Mr. Fitch and his wife seemed unable to break with the old-time instincts of hospitality. In consequence the prospect of debt loomed higher and higher in the Fitch horizon as the months came and went, though Mrs. Fitch worked miracles in turning and making over garments and each young person in the family contributed substantially to the housekeeping funds.

One day as Mrs. Fitch was wrestling with the "cheap cut," which is the idol of housekeeping experts in saving money, but the bane of those who try to follow the directions laid down by the said experts, Aunt Hannah Bruce came to spend the day, bringing a basket laden with hickory smoked ham, fresh eggs, a can of home-made maple syrup, a loaf of bread so big that Mrs. Fitch had to take the carving-knife later to saw across its huge bulk, a jar of cottage cheese, a roll of butter, honey, the last of the carefully pitted apples, crisp parsnips from the garden already beginning to show signs of spring, horseradish grated and ready for use, a big jar of apple butter and even a solid head of white cabbage from the same pit where the apples had been stored. Aunt Hannah was the only one of the numerous guests who ever came with such gifts, but today she had outdone herself.

"Sally," she said to Mrs. Fitch as that lady joyfully put away the miscellaneous collection of much bone, gristle, fat and flabby meat that comprised the cheap cut, and prepared to give her family a surprise with Aunt Hannah's good things; "Sally, I'm not one to mince words, as you know. I want you folks to come out and take charge of my farm while I go to California this spring to see Mattie. Her husband writes that she is homesick for me, and I know I'm homesick for her. I can't bear to leave my things in the hands of hired help, even if there was such a thing as hired help these days, so I want you to move out. You can rent your house here furnished till I get back, and you can have half the butter and eggs and chicken money all summer. It will make a nice outing for Joe and the children, though you'll have to work pretty hard. Now, what do you think of it?"

"It is so sudden," said Mrs. Fitch hesitatingly. "It is certainly very kind of you to offer us your home, Aunt Hannah, and I appreciate it, but I'll have to see what the rest say."

Shrewd Aunt Hannah wanted her scheme to go through, so she insisted upon helping Sally Fitch with the meal, though that lady would have been better pleased to attend to things herself. Aunt Hannah, in true country fashion, recklessly opened all the canned things she had brought, piled the cream thickly on the cottage cheese, and generally wasted the good food, in the opinion of Mrs. Fitch, who would have kept back some of the luxuries for a later date. However, Aunt Hannah knew her business, as later proved.

"To the country! And eat things like these three times a day all summer!" said Ned, heaping the apple butter on a thick slice of bread. "Me for the country!"

"Me too!" said Bob. "Gee! This ham tastes like more, mom!"

"How will I get back and forth to work?" asked Marjorie cautiously.

"We'll buy a second-hand auto," said Mr. Fitch. "I shall be very glad for the country all summer, as I am beginning to feel the confinement of the office."

"No need to buy an auto," said Aunt Hannah briskly. "There's Dobbin and the surrey. It may not be so swift as a new-fangled automobile, but it's sure."

The Fitch family discreetly said nothing, but they inwardly felt that Dobbin would not be called upon to carry them back and forth over the three miles that intervened between Aunt Hannah's farm and town. Through all the excitement and planning Mr. Fitch felt vaguely that his wife disapproved of the plan, but it wasn't until later that he was able to hear her views.

"It will be such a temptation for folks to drive out, Joe," she said half in tears as they talked things over that evening. "I'm ashamed to tell it, but the burden of hospitality is growing upon me just as the confinement of the office is growing upon you. I've thought it all over, and all we gain from the rent of this house will be eaten up by the cost of that auto and the additional company. I heard Nell telling Dick Noble about the plan this evening, and Dick said at once that he would drive out with his folks at least twice a week for a picnic. Don't you see that we will be overworked with the care of the garden and cows and chickens besides the company?"

The Fitch family moved out on a Tuesday in early April, and on Friday twenty young folks descended upon them for supper. "We knew you didn't really have to move anything but yourselves," they said gaily, "so we came to cheer you in your loneliness. We brought our suppers along so we would not make a bit of trouble. We knew the first week would be hard for you away from town."

It was a delightful evening, so the long table was spread on the porch and everybody lent a hand. "Mom," whispered Bob, "haven't you got something to help out with. Somehow things look kind of skimpy on the table."

Mrs. Finch glanced at the neat piles of lettuce sandwiches, the tiny cakes from the bakery, the two dishes of salad, the deviled eggs—one apiece—the festive heap of oranges and bananas, and decided that her son was right. From the store of things left by the thrifty Aunt Hannah she contributed a platter of country ham, sliced thinly, and delicious bread, sliced thickly, country butter, a big fruitcake, honey, preserves, pickles and thick cream for the hastily made pot of chocolate.

"Some fairy must have touched our spread with her wand!" remarked one of the young ladies as she noted the additions to the feast. "It is quite transformed. Think of such richness for you folks the whole blessed summer. I don't think it's quite fair that we are not all so well favored."

"We'll invite ourselves out frequently," said a young man. "I always did believe in the doctrine that the rich should share with the poor." They all laughed and the Fitch young folks hastened to say that their friends would always be welcome, but poor Mrs. Fitch could not bring herself to second the invitation as heartily as in the old days. However, nobody noticed her hesitation, so gay was the crowd on the big back porch.

An Armenian in America.

"How does it feel to be an Armenian in America?" asks a thoughtful friend. I stare at him. Does he wish to change places with me just once? "Write it, if you can't tell me," he urges. Yet even while I write these lines I wonder if he will really read what promises to be so painful.

Being an Armenian—an Armenian anywhere—gives one strange feelings. My mind is torn by the conflict of opposing emotions growing out of my racial inheritance and my living experience. Fear struggles with courage; pain with the will to endure; worry with optimism; depression with buoyancy; sorrow with faith; despair with hope; overshadowing death with promising life.

The injection of my friend's question into such a consciousness makes me gather my life into a shifting scene in which we Armenians, bleeding, wounded, murdered, outraged, drowning in the sea of barbarism, beaten by the waves of civilized cruelty, call out to the multitudes dwelling on the shore of security.

We cry the story of our life-long suffering, of our murdered manhood, our outraged womanhood, our dying babies, our tortured mothers, our crucified leaders. We cry in anguish and pain. We show our wounds. We call for help. The crowd on the shore throw out some handfuls of pennies which fall leaden into the waters. Our cry has not been understood.

Perhaps that band of strangers will be stirred by the story of our marvelous history of heroism. We tell of our struggle for liberty through the ages, of our martyrs who are countless, of the ever-undaunted courage of our men and women, of our undying faith in the triumph of right, and our unfailing hope of human goodness. Again we have failed to thrill the crowd upon the shore.

What has happened to the people who look out at the Armenian sea of suffering? They are incomprehensibly unresponsive. They seem almost motionless. We detect, however, a slight movement. It seems to spring from an emotion like that described in a cartoon published in a well-known American magazine, showing a gaunt figure of Armenia disturbing the peace of a fat Congressman, who, handkerchief to his eyes, exclaims, "Get out; you are breaking my heart." Yes, there almost seems to be a slight movement, a turning of the back to avoid a harrowing picture.

The scene gives way in mind to a question that stands out in letters of living fire: Has the world a heart? Alas! this is Armenia's eternal and unanswered question. People who appear great and noble talk about the heart of the world. Do they really believe in it? Are they sincere? Have virtue and love of human valor died? Is there only the false and pretentious?

The suffering that comes from feeling that we live in a shallow and isolated world is more tragic than the danger of impending death. For death we have always met fearlessly, but it is life—good, brave, real, serious life—which Armenia craves; and the time when she feels her wings broken is not when the enemy is out killing and plundering, but when she finds her friends turning their backs to avoid the painful picture. To be an Armenian in America is to be bitterly disappointed. To this country, this America so beloved, so rich, free, happy, it seems impossible to impart the sadness of an Armenian's life.

But why do I suffer? Haven't I the privilege of living in America, a privilege envied by others of my countrymen? Haven't I all the opportunities of an American? All this I have—freedom, position, opportunities, friends—but the happy smile of an American I can neither achieve nor buy. I walk about like one in a dream, my head heavy, my throat choked, my spirit crushed. I go to church and the minister reads from the old prophet of Israel, "How doth the city sit solitary that was full of people! She is become like a widow, that was great among the nations! Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? Behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow." I do not comprehend the application of the words. I keep asking myself, "Isn't it of me that the minister speaks? Is there any one else in the congregation who has lost his country, even as did the prophet?" I review the desolate cities of Armenia, its burned homes and ruined churches, its solitary hills and deserted streets. The rest of the minister's words are lost to me. As I walk out I cry silently to the passing crowds, "Is it nothing to you, O Americans, that I suffer, that my people are murdered, that my country is destroyed, that the virgins of Armenia die in shame in Moslem harems, that our children are starving, that our youth are still falling in the field so sacred to you, the battlefield of liberty? Is it nothing to you?"

I go to a concert, and the singer begins Mignon's passionate love song for her country, "Connais-tu le pays on fleurit l'oranger? C'est la, c'est la que je voudrais vivre, aimer, aimer et mourir." A desire to sob aloud seizes my whole being. I want to run away from the audience sitting there politely and smiling while they listen, they who cannot understand. I cry silently once again, "Is it nothing to you who have a country that I have none?"

I go to the mountains and the memory of the green hills of Armenia takes me back to its present valleys of tears. I leave the mountains and run away to the beach in despair. The gay crowds marching up and down bring to me the dark picture of columns of women and children marching up and down the plains of Armenia in search of herbs for food. I attend a dinner party and note the luxurious gowns and wasted food, and I am forced to think of the rags in which the once wealthy and beautiful women of my land are now clad. I pass through the streets where American children play, pretty, happy, careless, and in my vision rise the rows of our orphanages with their pale, solemn-faced babies. The bright side of every situation points out to me with unmistakable clearness the other, the darker side, the Armenian side, and so, confined in my Armenian being, I cannot step out into the freedom of America. I wait, still I wait for America to break my chains.

This is how it feels to be an Armenian in America.—Aghavnie Yeghenian, in the New Republic.

Aqua Regia.

In the chemistry class we learned how acids act on different substances. Sometimes they make a mixture that explodes or bursts into flames. Sometimes they eat up the substance to which they are applied. Sometimes they act slowly, showing that they do not have much power over what has been exposed to their action.

In the course of our experiments the professor gave us a bit of gold and told us to dissolve it. We tried one acid after another, but none had any effect on the gold. We left it all night in the strongest acid we had, but in the morning it was just as it had been the night before; we might as well have tried to dissolve it in water. We tried combinations of different acids, but still the gold remained unaffected. Finally we told the professor that we thought gold could not be dissolved.

He smiled. "I knew you could not dissolve the gold," he said. "None of the acids that you have there will attack it; but try this," and he handed us a bottle labeled, "Nitro-muriatic Acid (Aqua Regia)."

We poured some of the contents of the bottle into the tube that held the piece of gold. And the gold that had resisted so easily all the other acids quickly disappeared in the royal water. The gold at last had found its master.

The next day in the class-room the professor asked, "Do you know why it is called royal water?"

"Yes," we replied; "it is because it is the master of gold, which can resist almost everything else that can be poured on it."

"Boys," said he then, "it will not hurt the lesson today if I take time to tell you that there is one other substance that is just as impervious as gold; it cannot be touched or changed, though a hundred attempts are made upon it. That substance is 'the sinful heart.' Trial and affliction will not break it down; riches and honor will not soften it; imprisonment and punishment will not master it. Even education and culture will not dissolve the sinful heart and purify it of its dross. There is but one element that has power over it—the blood of Jesus Christ the Saviour, the aqua regia of the soul. Your souls are precious, infinitely more precious than the gold you have been working with. Do not trust your souls to the action of these other influences. They cannot touch or change them. But bring them under the blood of Jesus Christ and the sin of your soul will be dissolved away in the precious blood of the Son of God."—Youth's Companion.

Let the Nations Be Friends.

Lord God, the Friend of all mankind,
The smoke of battle makes men blind,
We can but grope in dim dismay,
Till clouds of war dust clear away.
Bring us to where Thy splendor streams
Fulfil in us thy prophet's dreams.

Let friendly flags be far unfurled,
Be hushed the quarrel of the world.
God's leaders can no more afford
The pagan swagger with the sword.
War attitudes but anger men,
And make them burn to fight again.

Gaunt hunger, death, and sorrows cry,
And lift pale hands against the sky.
Why burden more this labored breath?
Men have no time to play with death.
God knows we have enough to do,
To heal the world and build it new.

If cursing hate is burning yet,
If men there be who can't forget,
Then let love's fires flame hotter still,
Till they shall burn away the ill;
Let taunts and threats and boastings cease,
Let all the nations come to peace.

By love and trust must men grow great,
And live to put wars out of date.
Let armaments dissolve with rust,
And let mad sabers waste in dust.
White hands of peace in this new day
Must wash the stains of war away.

Michaelmas.

Virginia Castleman.

Little Lynn and I one morn
Strayed beneath the evergreens—
Hemlock, spruce, with boughs bent down,
Making for us fairy scenes.

First we played with sticks and cones
In the shadow of the trees,
Built us fences of the twigs—
Childlike, soon he tired of these.

Then we wandered with delight
Down the rippling brooklet way,
To the flower-garden bright—
Marigolds, petunias gay.

By the lily pond we paused.
There the yellow poppies blow,
And the water-lilies rare,
'Mid the floating leaf-isles grow.

And I decked my little knight
With the prettiest posies there—
Starry flowers, purple-hued
Michaelmas' daisies fair.

May St. Michael and his host
Guard him, little child of grace,
Guide aright his wavering feet
Till they reach the heavenly place.

Why We Celebrate October 12.

Mary Graham.

"America was discovered by Christopher Columbus on October 12, 1492." For 426 years this has been regarded as a historical fact of importance, marking an era, perhaps, but in the light of recent events we have come to attach a new significance to it. The discoverer was seeking a route to India and happened upon a new world. Little did he realize the import of his act. His indomitable spirit seemed indeed to be led on by an impelling destiny, and thwarted in one attempt to obtain the necessary equipment for his undertaking, he immediately made another effort to accomplish his purpose. He at last enlisted the interest of Isabella of Spain and succeeded in setting upon the voyage, the outcome of which we have long known as the Discovery of America. Now we have sensed it as Liberty seeking for a place to live.

As plants often need a complete change of soil in order to live or to continue their growth, so there were many principles and beliefs struggling for an existence in the old world to which this new country offered an opportunity for free and unrestrained growth and fruition. There came to America from all the countries of Europe those who sought refuge from religious persecution and opportunity for the enjoyment of civil liberty. And while for a time the old persecutions and narrowness were felt, yet the freedom sought for was realized to a great extent, and at least there were sown the seeds which have since produced the fruitful tree of Democracy.

The atmosphere of the new land seemed to give life to the principles of liberty, equality and fraternity. The mother countries, still cramped by the old ideas, did not realize the growth attained by liberty in the new world, and when England, influenced by the autocratic mind of her Hanover king, George III, sought to deal oppressively with the United Colonies, she found here a new spirit with which she had not thought to reckon. Magna Charta had been transplanted in new soil, and had grown into a Declaration of Independence, and Democracy had become a virile growth.

Shortly after America won its freedom from the old ideas, France arose, too, and threw off the yoke of tyranny, and England's monarchy became more and more limited, until today they claim they are more of a democracy than we are. But in Germany autocracy entrenched and fortified itself with militarism, and determined to hold to the old belief in the divine right of kings, and to the old maxim that might makes right. And so presumptious is the nature of autocracy that it has sought and claimed great things for itself to the unspeakable sorrow of those who have been called upon to exterminate it. It has grown there in Central Europe and tried to spread itself like an obnoxious weed until it has been necessary for the world to uproot it or be overrun by it.

We of America had enjoyed for so long the fruits of that liberty for which our forefathers shed their blood, that we were slow to realize the meaning of the conflict across the sea. We asked what they fought each other for, and what 'twas all about. But gradually we comprehended that some of the old things our forefathers had left in Europe were still living there, and threatened the existence of the very things which made life worth while, and to which we had long been accustomed. Our manhood realized that we must go to the rescue or be found wanting, and doubtless fall victims to the same evil. The Allies had suffered long, and began to wonder if America were really dead or asleep. But we had so long enjoyed other ideas that we were slow to comprehend the mind of the Hun. When we did understand its diabolical intent we were not slow in making preparations, and the message was sent that we were coming.

It was a great day when Pershing arrived in France, and his words echoed back, "Lafayette, we are here!" Since then the fields of France have been redeemed from the destroying pest, and Belgium has been made to hope again. We have gone from victory to victory. The American forces have fought with a spirit which could only have come from the joy of breathing freedom's native air, and we realize as never before the God-given blessings of democracy.

The Make-Believe Kitten.

Dora was barefoot at last, and her feet felt as if they had been going to school all the year and were just turned out for vacation. The first thing those feet did was to run down to the lane and pad up and down in the wheel tracks there. Dora thought it great fun to make long rows of tracks in the clean, deep sand.

But in a little while her feet began to feel hot and prickly. She sat down on the green bank to give them a rest, but she went on making tracks in the sand, this time with her fingers instead of with her feet. She discovered that by putting her fingers close together against the end of her thumb, as if she were squeezing the seed out of a ripe cherry, she could make funny little tracks exactly like those of a kitten.

Dora had always longed for a kitten of her own, and so it gave her a good deal of pleasure to pretend that the tracks belonged to a real kitten.

She leaned over and pressed her fingers carefully into the sand. "Here goes my kitten," she said. "Now he's walking slip, slip, slip; and now he hears me call, and away he goes, running pad, pad, pad." Then she made some deep tracks set far apart. "And here goes my kitten running clipper, clipper, clipper when he sees a saucer of cream."

Dora named the invisible kitten Puffkins, and every day she pretended to play with it. After a while the kitten tracks left the lane and went everywhere, up and down the road, through the soft earth in the garden, and even up to the front door. The make-believe cat seemed so real that the little girl could hardly believe that it didn't really belong to her.

One morning Dora made a line of little tracks all round the kitchen door: then she called, "Kitty, kitty!" and set out a saucer of milk by the doorstep. After that she went out to play in the fields.

To her great astonishment she found when she came back that the saucer was empty. The tracks were still there, and beside them were tracks on the doorstep, dusty tracks that Dora had not made. She stood looking in astonishment from the empty saucer to the dusty tracks.

Her face grew red and hot. Some one, she decided, had seen her playing with the imaginary kitten and had made the new tracks and emptied the saucer just to make fun of her. Tears came into her eyes. It had been such a happy game, not like having a real kitten of course, but still she had enjoyed it. And now the pleasure was all spoiled.

Dora stood still for a moment or two and then turned and ran across the yard to the big lilac bush that was always her refuge when things went wrong. She crept under the sheltering green boughs and sat there in a forlorn little heap.

It was so warm and fragrant under the lilacs that before long she fell asleep, and while she slept she had a dream. In the dream Puffkins was a real kitten, gray and fluffy; he came across the yard, mewing gently, and looked at her through the lilac blossoms.

"Mew, mew!" he said. Then he lifted a velvet foot and thrust it through the leaves. "Mew, mew!" he cried again.

Dora yawned and stretched. "Oh, such a lovely dream!" she sighed without opening her eyes. "If only it had been true!"

And suddenly it was true! A beseeching voice, the very voice of Puffkins, said again, "Me-e-ew!" Dora's eyes flew open, and right there before her was a fluffy gray head pushing through the leaves right under a big purple blossom. The fluffy head was followed by two paws and then by a little thin, gray body.

"Oh, here you are!" cried Dora. "Here you actually are, you blessed Puffkins!" She scrambled to her knees and caught the kitten in a loving grasp. "Only you are not puffy enough," she went on; "you are thin; your little ribs stick out."

Dora knew what is the best things for ribs that stick out, and so in exactly three minutes Puffkins was drinking his fill of good, warm milk beside the kitchen step. When he had finished he curled up in Dora's lap and began to pur. As he purred he told her how he had been a stray kitten for a long, long time and had heard her calling and had come into her yard, and how the first saucerful of milk had been, oh, so little, and how much he hoped he was going to be allowed to stay.

Dora did not understand the whole story, but she understood that last part of it. "Of course you are going to stay, you gray Puffkins," she said, "forever and ever. And now come straight along out into the sandy road and make some real true kitten tracks for me!"—Youth's Companion.

Dr. Katt.

The kittens four of Mother Puss
Were out of health one day;
Their tongues were white, their eyes were red,
They would not eat or play.

She sent at once for Dr. Katt,
Well known for being wise;
He felt their pulse, he saw their tongues,
And looked into their eyes.

"'Tis catalepsy," then he said,
"But not a case severe;
And some slight signs of cataract
About their eyes appear.

"So keep them dosed on catnip tea,
And you may be assured
No other treatment they will need,
And they will soon be cured."

Now Mother Puss was so much pleased
With Dr. Katt's advice,
She paid his bill, and gave him then
A jar of pickled mice.

What Your Name Means.

"We had the jolliest time at Arthur's house," said Richie. "His brother George showed us our names in the back of the big dictionary and read what each one means. Ours are ever so nice, better than Winifred's and Arthur's, even. What is mine, Dorothy?"

"Richard means 'rich-hearted,' or generous. Dorothy is 'gift of God.' Arthur means 'high' or 'noble.' Winifred is 'lover of peace.' George says that is why she always feel so sorry if we quarrel."

"George's name is right too," spoke up Richie. "It means a sort of farmer, and you know George wants to have a big ranch when he is a man. Do names mean just what the dictionary says, mother? Some of the meanings are so queer."

Mother smiled. "It is interesting to know what one's name is supposed to represent, and a fine meaning name may help us to be the fine, kindly person that makes it true. But the meaning we ourselves give to our names is more important than what stands after them in the dictionary. According to the dictionary, Elmer is a name that means 'noble,' just Arthur does. I have met several strong, true gentlemen who bore that name, but I still have a dislike for it because the first Elmer I knew was a mean, cowardly, untruthful, bullying boy."

"How did you come to choose our names?" asked Dorothy.

"The dictionary meaning helped us to decide on yours, because neither your papa nor I had known any Dorothy especially well, but you don't need to ask where Richie got his. Uncle Richard has made that one of the most beautiful names in the world to everybody that knows him. Most people received the names we have because some other George or Tom or Alice or Katherine or Dorothy was so good and kind that our parents hoped their sweet new baby would grow to be like that boy or girl or man or woman. One's name is a very special treasure, you see."

"I should say it is!" exclaimed Richie. "I hope I'll never spoil Uncle Richard's name for anybody. I'd like to make some mamma want to give her little boy the same name because I've helped to make it sound pleasant to her."—Child's Gem.

Babs and Betty.

Babs and Betty had been sent on an errand. Each one was to bring home a pint of milk in a little pitcher. Babs was to get a pint of cream, and mother told them to hurry as fast as they could without spilling the cream and the milk. Everything went well until the trip homeward. Then Babs said—or was it Betty?—"Don't get so close to me. Walk on the other side of the pavement." Then Betty—or was it Babs?—answered: "You have all the room you need! Get on the other side of the pavement yourseelf!" Then—dear me, no one knows even yet how it all happened, but somehow or other the milk was spilled, and the cream was spilled, and two crying, angry little girls arrived home with empty pitchers. Babs said it was all Betty's fault, and Betty said it was all Babs' fault, so mother could not tell at all, but she rather suspected that both little girls were to blame. She did not scold, however. Busy as she was, she sat down in a rocking chair in the kitchen and began to tell a story! Betty and Babs were surprised at that because they thought they would both be sent to bed for the rest of the day, but mother did not send them to bed unless she couldn't think of anything else to do. "Once there was a bear that was sent on an errand for dinner. His mother told him to bring home a pig for the evening meal," said mother, and all the tears on Betty's face and on Babs' face began to dry at once. "That same day a little fox was sent on an errand, too. He was told to bring home a chicken for dinner," continued mother. "Both of them trotted to do the errands. The bear caught a pig right away, and started home with it. The fox found a chicken, and he started home, too. On the way back they had to cross a stream. There was no bridge to walk on, but there was a good, strong log. On that log there was room for just one animal at a time. Right in the middle of the log the bear and the fox met, and neither would turn back to let the other one cross. They stood there and said perfectly dreadful things to one another, and they scolded and quarreled, but neither one would budge, although it would have taken just a few minutes to be polite about it."

"Weren't they silly to—" interrupted Babs, and then she stopped and said no more.

"Why didn't they—" began Betty, but she did not finish her sentence, either!

Mother paid no attention to the interruptions, except to bite her lip to keep from laughing. She just went on with the story.

"After a few minutes, when neither one would give up—splash! In they fell into the water, and away went the pig, and off flew the chicken—and that night neither the bear family nor the fox family had any supper." Mother stopped a minute, then she added slowly: "Here is a quarter and here are two little pitchers. I wonder if—" but she did not finish her sentence, either, for two little girls were flying up the road, laughing, and so sorry for their naughtiness. And that time the milk and the cream came back without one single drop being spilled!—Belfast Witness.

On the Wings of the Dandelion.

Once upon a time Mary told a naughty little lie to two of her neighbors, and her mother, hearing of it, was terribly shocked.

"Oh, but it won't go a bit further, mother, dear," Mary said.

But her mother gave a sad little sigh: "I see I shall have to teach you a lesson," and Mary's heart sank—for this sounded uncomfortably like a bad punishment! But her mother pointed to a fuzzy white-headed dandelion gone to seed in the front lawn:

"I want you to pick it, Mary; then, carrying it upright, I want you to run all the way down the street and back to me."

Mary sang a little tune, for this seemed a jolly, nonsensical punishment!

So she picked the dandelion and went dancing down the street with a merry hop-skip-and-jump, while away blew the fuzzy white seeds. When she came back to the porch her cheeks were pink and her eyes twinkling; but her mother's face was solemn.

"Now go back down the street, dear, and pick up every one of the seeds. Hurry!"

But Mary couldn't hurry—slowly she meandered across lawns and sidewalks, looking, and looking, and looking; but somehow those little seeds had all mysteriously disappeared.

The wind must have thought it a clever game to scatter them throughout the neighborhood, for try as she might, she found only two of the countless bits of dandelion floss.

Big salty tears rolled down her cheeks as she laid them quietly in her mother's lap.

"You see, Mary dear, that your story has spread all over the neighborhood as quickly and mysteriously as the dandelion wings have done, and however hard you may try, you can never bring it back home again. For a word once spoken is gone forever."—Exchange.

When Mother Plays With Me.

Sometimes when it is raining hard,
My mother plays with me;
She makes believe she's keeping house
And I'm her company.

And when I knock upon the door
She says: "Come in, sit down;
I'm very glad that you have come;
When did you get to town?"

And then we talk about our 'fairs;
How fast the children grow;
"What! had the measles, did you say?
You did not let me know."

Then, when we've had a cup of tea,
It's time for me to go.
I say, "Good-bye, dear Mrs. Brown;
I have enjoyed it so."

And so I like a rainy day,
When mother plays with me,
And makes believe she's keeping house,
And I'm her company.

—Isabel McKenzie.

The Barber Who Became A Knight.

The story of the barber Arkwright is a merry tale of a man who seemed from the first destined to succeed. He took up Hargreaves' work, but not his hard lot, for the fates had spun for this clever lad had a bright thread of golden success.

The youngest of a family of thirteen children, Richard Arkwright was early put to the trade of a barber. "I shall prove all my life that thirteen can be a lucky number; I'll be the best barber in London," he vowed.

He went at his work with a will. "The fairest shave in merry England for a penny," was his watchword in a day when men of the razor were charging twopence. Over the entrance to his basement shop he hung his sign bearing the challenge of his motto.

But not for long was he content to live by cutting beards and the rate of shaves. "My real chance lies in the way of wigs," said Master Dick. And in the day when all the rich and great coveted finer locks than nature had given them, he managed to furnish the fashionable wigmakers with the best hair a magic dye that was in itself a fortune.

See how one thing leads to another. In his travels about the country in search of fair locks and curling ringlets, this alert and enterprising barber became interested in the new spinning-jenny and its work.

"There is just one trouble," he heard a weaver declare; "the jenny's threads are not strong enough for the warp; so the foundation of our coton goods must be made of linen."

"That seems a poor sort of contriving," said Arkwright. "Now I have never been one to content myself with half-way measures. Perhaps you weavers will have to call in a barber to finish you off—give you a good clean shave," he added, with his merry laugh.

But he set himself to the task seriously, so seriously indeed, that his wife, who was something of a shrew, declared, "You'll starve your poor family scheming when you should be shaving!" And she proved how much in earnest she was by breaking into bits the queer contrivance he had managed to put together. But the spirit of the inventor was not so easily broken.

"The time has come for me to work under another roof," he said, with calm determination, "for my attempt shall go on in spite of all the shrews in England!"

We are not told if this shrew was tamed. We only know that she failed to put a check on the inventive zeal of Richard Arkwright. He went on with his experiments, more resolved than ever to solve his puzzle. Engaging the help of a clever clock-maker, he developed a machine called the "water-frame," which, driven by water-power, carried the carded cotton through pairs of turning rollers, each succeeding pair revolving more rapidly than those before, until at last it drew out a yarn strong and firm enough to be used for the lengthwise, or warp, threads. English cotton cloth could now hold its own; and to this day we find in the large cotton-mills both in England and America the lucky barber's method of drawing out strong threads for the warp, while the principle of the spinning-jenny is employed in the production of the weft, or woof, threads.

Now, the one-time barber had a chance to prove himself not only an inventor, but also an excellent business man. He did not leave it to others to reap the benefits of his invention. Going to Nottingham, he became the ruling partner in a manufacturing firm which before long produced the first British calico—and a fortune for the enterprising Arkwright.

"Water-power, wisely employed, and a genuine business talent together made the barber's fortune," it was said. It was, however, something more than these that went into the building of this successful man's prosperity—something that might be called four-square man-power. When he harnessed his will to a task, it seemed as if he could move mountains.

One thing that perhaps more than another indicates the measure of the man was the way in which he set himself to the study of grammar when nearing the age of sixty. "When I was but a small lad, I was put to work. If then I was too young to earn my living, I am now too old to learn to write and spell correctly." So the great "captain of industry," whose business cares occupied all his working hours, took time from his small allowance for rest to atone for the shortcomings of his early schooling.

To a friend who wanted to know why one of the richest men of the realm should vex himself with such tasks, he said, "That man is indeed poor who does not know or care where he lacks."

The barber, turned inventor and manufactured, amassed a fortune of hal fa million pounds—vast wealth for those times—and was made a knight for his services to his country.—Mary Parkman in St. Nicholas.

The Rest of Night.

Martha S. Pinckney.

Thank Thee, our Father, for the blessed rest of night;
For the kind mantling darkness
That wraps Thy tired, wayward world in sweet forgetfulness.
Thanks for dewy restfulness,
And the sweet dreams that come like messengers from those we long to see;
Or waft us on the clouds of fantasy far from the day's reality
Hallowed be Thy name
For the deep draft of strength to meet the dawn
And the new chance for better work another day.

The Katydids.

Just as soon as summer gets fairly settled, as we say, the grasshopper family makes its appearance. Its members all wear green, of a shade that closely resembles the vegetation upon which they feed. Grasshoppers, locusts, and katydids all have a close relationship and resemblance.

The common field grasshoppers have long antennae, or feelers, and look very much like jointed toys as they hop about in the grass. They are very lively little insects, as you find when you pass through one of the grassy fields in which they live. On very hot days in August the locust grasshoppers are exceedingly muscal. And whenever we hear their loud, wheezy call, especially in the forenoon, we are apt to prophesy that the day will be an especially hot one.

The grasshoppers have some cousins that have long horns and quite well-developed wings, that live mostly in the trees upon the foliage of which they feed, and they may be heard conversing sociably together as you pass their tree homes in late summer or early fall.

They sing mostly at nightfall, and generally from the tops of trees, where they insist upon telling that "Katy did," in very positive tones. These insects differ from birds in the production of sounds they make, by rubbing their wings together instead of using their vocal organs.

Where a number of katydids get together in late August or early September, if you should happen to be walking along the roadside near their tree homes nightfall, you would be apt to hear them loudly declaring that "Katy did," but no matter how long you might linger, you would never hear them assert that Katy didn't. So we must suppose that Katy is a very obedient little insect and always does just as she is told.—Our Dumb Animals.

A Large Room.

"Thou hast set my feet in a large room," said the Psalmist. And life would be a large room if we only gave God His rightful place within it. How we need to recover the sense of the spaciousness of life that we are in danger of losing. What a little, insignificant, circumscribed thing we make of our lives, yet how great, how divine, they really are. We walk along the dusty streets, with high man-made barriers on either side, beyond which we cannot see, above which we cannot rise, and we forget that outside of all this lies the great world in which our little street is but a worm's track upon the sand; forget that beyond our narrowness is the wide room of earth, sky and sea in the midst of which God would have us live and serve.

God speaks to the Christian churches and bids them break down their walls of exclusive and narrow privilege, that they may air their stuffy interiors with the breath of human fellowship. God is speaking to the political forces of America and of the world calling them forth from their pitiful houses narrowly reared and roofed with partisanship and self-seeking, to view the needs of mankind in the clear light of moral and bounden duty. God is calling the nations today out of their unwholesome and gloomy caves, to catch a vision of world service and opportunity. He is speaking, too, to individual men and women, calling upon us to come forth out of our shells of selfishness and smug indifference, to look upon our work no longer as drudgery to be done somehow, we care not how, but as a sacred and solemn trust; to regard our fellowmen not as fields for rich exploitation, but as opportunities for deathless service; to open our eyes and see that life is not a mean and groveling thing, but a noble and lofty destiny; and then because life is noble to go forth and be noble, and righteous, and useful, too. God would set the world's feet today in a large room.

Is your life a spacious room or a narrow cell? Is your life hampered and mean and small? It is not so essentially. It is only our own smallness of soul that makes it seem so. We have banished God; that is the trouble. Give Him His rightful place and all will be different. Believe in God with all your heart, trust Him, serve Him, and He will lift you out of life's meanness, that in the midst of life's large room He may firmly set your feet.—Exchange.

RESOLUTIONS.

At a meeting of the vestry of South Farnham Parish, Essex County, held in St. John's Church, at Tappahannock, Va., on Thursday, the 22d day of September, 1921, the following resolutions were offered and unanimously adopted:

Whereas, it has pleased our heavenly Father to call our beloved rector, the REV. WILLIAM NELSON MEADE, from us and his earthly labors to the rest that remaineth to all the people of God, we, the vestry, bowing in humble submission, and deeply lamenting in common with the whole community, the loss which we have sustained in the death of our rector, who so faithfully and earnestly preached the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, and administered the sacraments of the Church for nearly seventeen years to this people, and whose labors were so abundantly blessed, take courage in the inspiration of his unselfish life, and joyfully and hopefully we enter into the rich heritage which he leaves us.

Inspired with the love of our heavenly Father, Mr. Meade devoted his entire life to the service of his church and his fellowman; inspired with the love of our heavenly Father, he nobly died, leaving a memory which is truly a gentle and touching benediction to his church, his family and to his community.

Be it therefore resolved, that we mourn the loss which his congregation, the whole Church in the Diocese, and his family have sustained by his death; that a copy of these resolutions be recorded in the register of this vestry, a copy be forwarded to his family, to the Southern Churchman and to the Tidewater Democrat.

IN MEMORIAM.

CHARLES EDWARD SHEPHERD.

After a brief illness, our friend and co-laborer, CHARLES EDWARD SHEPHERD, entered into life eternal on Sunday morning, September 18, 1921.

Mr. Shepherd was a faithful and loyal member of St. Andrew's Church for a number of years and until his death, a vestryman for fourteen years, treasurer of the church and secretary of the Sunday school; also a member of the choir. There was no movement for the advancement of the kingdom or welfare of mankind in which he was not intensely interested and active. Of a warm and genial disposition, affable and courteous, capable and industrious, he radiated a spirit of optimism and hope, and it was always a privilege and pleasure to have him as companion and co-worker. No task was too arduous nor journey too long if to be of service to his fellowman. In the hour of need he was sympathetic, and freely ministered to the comforts and necessities of those in trouble.

In the death of Mr. Shepherd, the church has lost an earnest and devoted member, the vestry an active and enthusiastic worker and wise counsellor, and the Sunday school and choir a zealous laborer. While his spirit has passed on to his heavenly home, the memory of Mr. Shepherd will ever live in the hearts of his fellow-vestrymen.

Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

Be it therefore resolved, that we, the vestry of St. Andrew's Church, convey to the family of our deceased friend and brother our heartfelt sympathy and condolence, with the prayer that our heavenly Father will supply His Holy Spirit to comfort and strengthen them in this sad hour and guide and sustain them through life.

Be it further resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family of Mr. Shepherd, that they be spread upon the minutes of the vestry, and published in the Southern Churchman and the News-Leader.

The Rev. Robert McCutchen has recently entered upon his duties as rector of the church at Del Rio and Brackettville, Diocese of West Texas. Mr. McCutcheon comes from Holy Trinity Mission, Zamboanga, Philippine Islands.

The Rev. Azael Coates, of Philadelphia, has accepted an appointment to Manhein and Mount Hope, Pa., Diocese of Harrisburg.

After October 8 the address of Bishop G. Mott Williams will be care Morgan Harjes & Co., 31 Boulevard Haussmann, Paris, France. Bishop Williams is undertaking a visitation of the American churches in Europe.

The Rev. R. O. Mackintosh has succeeded the Rev. Goodrich R. Fenner as rector of Uvalde and Montell, Tex. Mr. Mackintosh has been serving the church in the Rio Grande Valley and has organized the work at Mercedes, Dena, McAllen and Mission.

The Rev. O. E. Newton has accepted a call to St. Stephen's Church, Clifton Heights, in the Diocese of Pennsylvania, and expects to begin work there in a month or two.

The Rev. Lee L. Rose, after a year in North Carolina, returns to Central New York to assume charge of parishes in Elmira Heights and Horseheads.

The address of the Rev. P. Parker Phillips, D. D., is changed from Alexandria, Va., to 2131 Florida Avenue, N. W., Washington, D. C.

The Rev. C. A. G. Heiligstedt, formerly rector of Grace Church, Ottawa Kan., has taken charge of St. John's Parish, Parsons.

The Rev. Steven D. Thaw has accepted the call to St. Paul's, Harrisburg, Pa., and will enter upon his work there November 1.

The Rev. R. M. Hardman, a retired priest of the Missionary District of South Dakota, is spending the winter at Llano and is giving the communicants of this mission the ministrations of the Church. Mr. Hardman at one time was priest in charge of Beeville and Kenedy.

Mr. Sidney L. Morgan, of Pittsburgh, is studying for Holy Orders in the Missionary District of Wyoming, and is in charge of the work at Hanna, under the direction of Dean Thornberry.

The Rev. B. Dennis has given up his work at San Marcus and Lockhart, Tex., and has returned to his home in Virginia.

The Rev. U. B. Bowden, of Yoakum, Tex., has been in poor health for several months, and has been with his son, the Rev .Paul Bowden, at Warrenton, Va., and other members of his family near Sewanee, Tenn. His health is much improved, and he will soon return to his work.

The Rev. Albert Martin celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his rectorship of Trinity Parish, Yazoo City, Miss., on Sunday, October 2.

The Rev. Julius C. H. Sauber, civic chaplain of the Diocese of Pittsburgh, was married on September 17 in Boston to Miss Theodora Burnham. They are now at home, 2625 Tilbury Avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Ordinations.

The Rev. Gordon M. Reese was advanced to the priesthood on Sunday morning, September 25, in Trinity Church, Houston, Tex. The Rt. Rev. Clinton S. Quin, Bishop Coadjutor of the Diocese of Texas, ordained the candidate, and those who joined in the laying on of hands were the Rev. Messrs. Charles Clingman, L. Valentine Lee, T. J. Windham, Harris Masterson and George Ossman. The Rev. Charles Clingman, rector of Trinity Church, preached the sermon and the Rev. L. Valentine Lee presented Mr. Reese. The Rev. Mr. Reese is Secretary of Young People's Work in the Diocese of Texas, and is also young people's pastor of Trinity Church, Houston.

On the Eighteenth Sunday after Trinity, in Christ Cathedral, Salina, Kan., Vernon Alban Weaver, Samuel Francis Lyons and Francis Core Reynolds were ordered deacons by Bishop Mize. The sermon was preached by the Bishop, and the candidates were presented by Archdeacon C. E. Maltas. The Rev. Mr. Weaver will be stationed at Concordia, Kan., the Rev. Mr. Lyons at Anthony, Kan., and the Rev. Mr. Reynolds at Hays, Kan.

On the Eighteenth Sunday after Trinity, September 25, in St. Paul's Memorial Church, San Antonio, Mr. Claude Robert Parkerson was ordered deacon by the Rt. Rev. William T. Capers, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of West Texas. The candidate was presented by the Ven. B. S. McKenzie, Archdeacon of the Diocese. Mr. E. D. Williams, who is soon to be ordered deacon, acted as Bishop's chaplain; the sermon was preached by the Bishop. This ordination is of more than usual interest to the Church, and especially to the members of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, for Mr. Parkerson served the Church during the war as one of the Army and Navy Brotherhood secretaries with great faithfulness and ability in the camps of Oklahoma and Texas. Mr. Parkerson has served the Church for nearly twenty years as Church army evangelist in England, as a S. P. G. Catechist in the Diocese of Saskatchewan, Can., and as a lay worker in Nebraska and Wyoming before coming to the Diocese of West Texas. At the close of the war Bishop Capers took charge of St. Paul's Memorial Church, which is situated right at the centre of Fort Sam Houston, as the Bishop's Church for army work, appointing Mr. Parkerson as his lay assistant with license to preach. Mr. Parkerson has shown exceptional ability in reorganizing the work of the parish, and has greatly endeared himself to the members of the congregation and men of the army by his faithfulness and devotion to duty. Mr. Parkerson, who has been at St. Paul's Church three years, has been appointed by the Bishop to continue as vicar. At the same hour of the ordination at St. Paul's, a brother, Mr. Leonard Stanley Parkerson, was being ordered deacon in Oxford Cathedral, England, by the Lord Bishop of Oxford. The Diocese of West Texas is most grateful to the Brotherhood of St. Andrew for sending Mr. Parkerson into the Diocese. Another Brotherhood war work secretary is soon to be ordered deacon (D. V.) on St. Andrew's Day, who has rendered most faithful service to the Diocese for the past year. Two more such men are needed for the work of the Diocese, and if the Brotherhood of St. Andrew can furnish them, the Diocese will be grateful.

On Wednesday, September 28, at Trinity Church, Victoria, Tex., occurred the ordination to the sacred order of priests the Rev. Louis A. Parker by the Rt. Rev. W. T. Capers, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, who also preached the sermon. The following clergy were present: The Rev. Messrs. George W. Smith, of Cuero; H. R. Remson, of Port Lavaca; M. A. McKevgh, of Goliad, and D. A. Sanford, lately of Amarillo. The Rev. Mr. Parker has been engaged as worker for the Near East Relief for two years at least. He is to sail from New York on October 12, and after visiting several countries in Europe, will proceed to Armenia, and to other countries where relief is needed.

Deaths.

The Rev. George Pomeroy Allen, rector of St. Mary's Church, Ardmore, Pa., died at his home in Ardmore September 21, at the age of seventy-six. He had been ill all summer, but had recovered sufficiently to preach the Sunday before his death.

Mr. Allen was born in Philadelphia, and was graduated from the University of Pennsylvania and the Philadelphia Divinity School. For twenty-one years he was rector of Trinity Church, Bethlehem, Pa., which he resigned to come to Ardmore in 1900.

The funeral Friday at the church was attended by many members of the congregation and many friends along the Main Line.

One son, Major Alfred R. Allen, M. D., was killed in action with the Seventy-ninth Division in France in 1918.

The Rev. George H. Houghton Butler, who resigned in May, 1912, after sixteen years in charge of St. Mary's Mission in Sherwood Park, Yonkers, N. Y., died Saturday, September 10, in a hospital after a protracted illness. Funeral services were held at St. Stephen's Church, in West Sixty-ninth Street, New York.

A Prayer

. . . FOR THE . . .

Brotherhood Convention

Heavenly Father, Who art the source of all wisdom and of all goodness, bless we pray Thee with Thy unfailing grace the members of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. Guard and strengthen them all, in body and in spirit; and help them to grow daily in the knowledge and love of Thy Son our Lord. Make them deeply sensible of the privilege and the responsibility of their convention, about to assemble in Thy Name and Presence, especially make the Junior members keenly aware of Thy call to service. Reward those who have been our leaders in the past and raise up successors to them in the coming years. Grant that those who meet together as followers of Thine apostle, Saint Andrew, may likewise go forth in obedience and useful service, and give us all a clearer vision of Thy coming Kingdom, Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

A spar, broken and lashed together with spun yarn tightly drawn and well tarred, is stronger at the point of fracture than it was before. So, with Christ, anything is possible for us, in the way of restoration, of cure of old faults, of ceasing to repeat former sins. —Alexander Maclaren.

How in the world can we expect the worldly, the non-Christian, to take the Church seriously, if her own members do not even the same? What is more unreasonable than to expect men to be true to the ideals set forth by Christ Jesus, when by our open, public and avowed deeds we disclaim their worth! —Christian Advocate.

Our wills must be in following Christ, or it means nothing. All true obedience begins, not in the outward action, but in the inward spring of all activity; that is, in the will. We must will to do His will, if we would follow Christ. We become obedient within before we are obedient in the outward act. The moment for action may not have arrived, but the time for willing to be obedient is always present.—Ruskin.

We are purposed for union with our Lord. The Scriptures resound with this teaching from end to end. Every call in its pages is a call to a rectified communion with our Maker. That union has been broken, and broken by nothing but sin. And if peace is to be regained, the union must be restored. It must be the union of will with will, my will lifted like a sail, while the breath of the Lord blows upon it, moving my life in an appointed way. It must be the union of heart with heart. God and man sharing common sorrows and common joys. This is peace. Man's life moving in God's life is frictionless communion.—J. H. Jowett.

The common problems, yours, mine, every one's,
Is not to fancy what were fair in life
Provided it could be, but, finding first
What may be, then find how to make it fair
Up to our means, a very different thing!
My business is not to remake myself,
But make the absolute best of what God made.
—Robert Browning.

Mercifulness manifests itself in two ways: first, in patience and forbearance toward those who do wrong, leniency toward those who fail; and, secondly, in ministrations of kindness and love to those who are in need. The first of these manifestations is negative. The other phase of the quality is active and positive.—Rev. J. R. Miller, D. D.

Do not look forward to what might happen tomorrow; the same everlasting Father who cares for you today will take care of you tomorrow and every day. Either He will shield you from suffering or He will give unfailing strength to bear it. Be at peace, then, and put aside all anxious thoughts and imaginations.—Francis de Sales.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., OCTOBER 15, 1921. No. 42.

AN ANNOUNCEMENT

With the utmost gratification we are permitted, on behalf of the Southern Churchman Company, to announce that from this issue the Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D., becomes editor of the Southern Churchman.

The change in editorship thus indicated is more nominal than real. For more than seven years Dr. Bowie has been a most valued helper in the conduct of the paper. It was he who suggested, and for several years edited, the department dedicated to Christian Social Service under the title of Christianity and the Community. After giving up this department to Mr. Montague when he went to France in 1918, he gave, after his return, valuable aid in securing special articles for publication, and continued to write occasionally for the editorial page; but only within the last two years has he consented to have his name appear as associate editor. Since that time, however, the leading editorials week by week have been generally, and for the past twelve months almost exclusively, from his pen. They have attracted wide attention, and our readers are already so well acquainted with his excellent work that he requires no introduction from us save this acknowledgment of our indebtedness for his generous assistance. The intellectual equipment, the literary talent and the even finer spiritual qualifications which Dr. Bowie brings to his larger task justify us in anticipating renewed prosperity and usefulness for the Southern Churchman, the editorial control of which now passes entirely into his hands.

The Rev. R. Cary Montague will continue upon the editorial staff with enlarged duties. To him as well as to Dr. Bowie, to his faithful and efficient secretary and assistant in the office, and to the business staff, the retiring editor would express the grateful appreciation he feels for their co-operation so loyally given, and especially for their readiness in supplementing his service during a prolonged period of ill health. Moreover, he is spared the pain of saying Adieu to them or to our readers, for while, at his own request, he is relieved from a burden of responsibility he is no longer fitted to bear, an honorary place has generously been assured him with the opportunity to continue such service as he is able to perform.

May the blessing of God abide upon the Southern Churchman and upon all who conduct it or contribute to the fulfilment of its mission!

EDWARD L. GOODWIN.

THE CHURCH'S MISSION

We have sometimes seen, even in Episcopal addresses, allusions to the calling, or duty, or responsibility of the Episcopal Church which would seem to indicate that in the minds of the writers there was something quite special or peculiar about it. We recall a sermon preached before the General Convention some years ago, by a good Bishop from the mid-West, in which he defined the present mission of this Church in a fashion that seemed to us very narrow and uncatholic indeed. The idea seemed to be that under existing conditions we were set to minister to certain choice people and to guard what we have, which was something peculiarly our own and in constant danger of being mislaid or forgotten. Certainly some such notion lurks in the minds of many, whether it finds expression in words or not.

"Probably it was inevitable that we should come to take somewhat the same view of ourselves that others have taken of us. Certainly we have done so in some degree. With all our self-appreciation we have lived in a limited notion of what it is possible for us to do. We have been at once bold and timid. We have been burdened with self-consciousness. We have dwelt upon what we have called the "mission of our Church." The real mission of our Church is nothing less than the eternal, universal mission of the Church of Christ, which is the preaching of righteousness, the saving of souls, the building of the Kingdom of God. All mere special commissions and endowments are matters of method, and ought to be much less kept before our consciousness and much less set before the world.

"We are too much in the habit of asking, when a new town or city is offered as a possible field for an Episcopal Church, whether there are any "Church people" there, as if that name prescribed a special kind or order of humanity to whom alone we were to consider ourselves as sent. The real question ought to be whether there are human creatures in that town. We are sent to the human race. That larger idea of our mission must enlarge our spirit and our ways, and make us fit to bear our part in the broad salvation of the world. . . . The Church is bound to seek men; not merely to stand where men can find her if they wish, but to go after them and claim them. . . . We need more and not less boldness and assurance of what we are and what we have to do."

Many years ago we heard an essay read before one of our Convocations on an appointed subject which was something like this, "How shall we bring the distinctive features of our Church to the thoughtful attention of the people?" The conclusion of the essayist, as we remember, was to the effect that "We don't have to." He was of the opinion that if our Church was faithful and diligent in her appointed business of preaching the gospel of God and bringing souls to the knowledge and obedience of Christ, her distinctive features were sufficiently attractive and convincing to take care of themselves. So we have always believed. The Church that brings a man to the feet of the Master to receive the riches of His forgiveness and grace will always find that man loyal also to herself and appreciative of her excellencies; and if he has not been so brought his allegiance is hardly worth having. A really good mother does not have to insist that she is the best and wisest mother in the neighborhood; her own children will believe that by a happy instinct, and will defend their faith against all comers. Let her bring her many sons and daughters to their birth and all the rewards of motherhood will be multiplied unto her.

It seems to us that the thought of the Church and her ministers needs again and again to be recalled to their primary and essential mission. It is so easy to take the chief things for granted and to become wholly occupied with the secondary and even with the comparatively trivial. The days in which this Church in this country had its most rapid and substantial growth were the days when men were sent forth to preach. That was their mission, other things were subsidiary, and she lost power when, as Bishop Brooks said, she became self-conscious and burdened with a sense of some peculiar method or deposit of her own. Did not St. Paul have somewhat this idea in mind when he was deciding the question about the comparative value of spiritual gifts for the Church at Corinth? After insisting that none was of any value without love, he determines the matter in favor of the gift of preaching—telling forth the message of God. And the reason seems to be that while the other "gifts" were helpful for themselves, prophesy was good for those outside, who filled the place of the unlearned. "He that speaketh in a tongue edifieth himself, but he that prophesieth edifieth (buildeth up, margin) the Church." The whole chapter, the fourteenth of First Corinthians, might well be studied, mutatis mutandis, with this thought of the Church's true mission in mind.—E. L. G.

THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN AND DR. GOODWIN

The Southern Churchman has had a long history; and all which has been noble in that history has been woven from the gift of godly souls. The paper has never been endowed with money. It has had a loyal group of Churchmen who, as its stockholders, have helped it at certain periods when the way was difficult. But for a far larger part of its career it has had neither subsidy nor gifts. It has therefore not always presented what ideally we should have desired in its mechanical make-up and the other material things which indicate large expense. But we trust that it can claim a better thing. It has sought to bring the message of a living Christianity, and of loyalty to the strong simplicity of a Church which must speak in the voice of the different generations the unchanging message of the Christ.

In the record of the Southern Churchman no man has served it with finer devotion than the editor who now retires from his more active responsibilities, though as long as God gives him to us he shall never retire in his counsel and help. Edward L. Goodwin comes of a family conspicuous both in this and other generations for its representatives in the ministry. He represents the flowering of that beautiful ideal of the Christian home which, when once it is realized, brings forth lives ready for the service of the Master whom the most sweet and intimate relationships have from childhood helped to make real. He represents all which is best in the churchmanship that has been native to the old Commonwealth where first the liturgy of the Church of England was used upon the shores of this new world. In ripeness of scholarship, in just and generous sympathies, in steady loyalty to the finest evangelical conception of the Church, he has given to the Southern Churchman for these last seven years its personality from his own.

When the apostles went up to the temple and found the lame man at the beautiful gate, it is recorded that Peter said: "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I thee. In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth rise up and walk!" Like those apostles, the Southern Churchman has not been able usually to give to the Church the things which are bought with silver and gold; but through Edward L. Goodwin, and the men who have preceded him, it has spoken in the name of Jesus. It has said to those who halted, "Rise up and walk." It has encouraged the spirits of the lame in faith to go in new and thrilling gladness through a Beautiful Gate.

The best thing that we, who seek to carry on the work of Dr. Goodwin, aim for is to be able to speak with authentic reality in that Name by which he speaks.

CHRIST IN THE WORLD.

The call of the hour is to make all men see that the world's great need is Christ. The problem not alone concerns the church-goer, but more especially those who have gotten off the path of righteousness, and who wander idly through the shallow labyrinth of materialistic notions that pervade the world today.

Before the latter can be reached, the Church must take stock of itself, both pulpit and pew. Can it meet the test of God? Do ministers of today act as if getting the gospel of Jesus Christ to the public is the most important thing in life? Does the average church-goer attend Sunday services from force of habit, or because his body and spiritual self hungers for the Word of God?

Each man can answer for himself, and in so doing, perhaps, explain one reason for the "missing flock." That reason is psychological. It concerns the heart.

The modern salesman knows it by the business maxim: First sell the product to yourself, before you attempt to sell it to others. Only then will you be able to instill into your listeners that what you say regarding it you actually believe.

The action of the Church and its members does not always meet this test. Many ministers annually take vacations of from two to three months in length. Members of churches excuse themselves from attendance at services on excuses that are neither here nor there. Such actions may appear as mere trifles to those within the fold, but it often strikes a very different chord in those whom the Church is attempting to reach.

It stresses the point that the Word of God, to believers themselves, is not always to be interpreted as the most important thing in life. If it were, say non-church-goers, how can a minister excuse himself from his duties for two and three months at a time; why do church members absent themselves from services with the slight excuse of this day and age?

Here, indeed, is a morsel of thought for reflection. What dominates the thought of a people dominates their action. If the Church, both pulpit and pew, does not reflect the importance of the gospel of Jesus Christ, not alone on Sundays, but week-days as well, how can they persuade other people to believe that that message is the greatest thing in the world?—Editorial Minneapolis Journal.

THY BROTHER.

O gentle man, the common man is yet thy brother, and thy gentleness should make him great, infecting him with thy humility, not rousing in him the echo of a vile unheavenly scorn. Wilt thou, with thy lofty condescension, more intrinsically vulgar than ever his ugly self-assertion, give him cause too good to hate thy refinement? It is not thy refinement makes thee despise him; it is thy own vulgarity, and if we dare not search ourselves close enough to discover the low breeding, the bad blood in us, it will one day come out plain as the smitten brand of the galley slave.—Selected.

THE BEGINNING OF THE CHURCH IN AMERICA

By the Rev. Corbin Braxton Bryan, D. D.

The importance of the settlement at Jamestown lies in the fact that then, at last, the English race began to come into permanent possession of their portion in the New World, and to shape the destiny of this continent. They were belated in so doing, but when they came they brought with them principles, civil and religious, which in the circumstances they could hardly have brought sooner; and to which, under God, they owe the supremacy they have achieved.

For two generations the power of Spain, armed with the exhaustless wealth of the Indies, and directed by the fanatical minds of the Emperor Charles V and his son, Philip II, bent upon the aggrandizement of the Kingdom of Spain and of the Church of Rome, had threatened the civil and religious liberty of every Protestant power in Europe. During that period any settlement of Englishmen in America had proved impossible. It was all England could do to maintain her independence at home, and assist others struggling in the same cause. This she did throughout the long reign of Elizabeth, giving assistance and a refuge for the French Huguenots, and fighting the battles of the Dutch against Spain in the Netherlands. At last, in the overthrow of the Armada in 1588, the liberty of England was assured; and upon the accession of James I peace was established between Spain and England, and a better opportunity was thereby afforded for the settlement of an English colony in America. But though peace had been declared, war was in the hearts of both nations, and many of the English who, under Elizabeth, had been fighting Spain for years, went over to the Netherlands, and continued the fight there in behalf of the Dutch.

In the meantime the great question of religion, on which all the rest hinged, had been determined, and so a colony could be established homogeneous in faith as Protestants; and no sooner was the peace declared than the minds of the English turned again to Virginia.

The Colony of Virginia is sometimes conceived of as a mere commercial and mercenary venture, in which "to get the pearl and gold" was the chief idea; and those who founded the colony are represented, as for the most part mere adventurers, without principles either political or religious. Doubtless "the pearl and gold" was the only idea with many "adventurers" who stayed at home, and adventured a subscription to the company's stock, and also of many "planters" who adventured themselves into the wilds of the New World. But the conception and purpose of those who planted and maintained the colony was of the broadest and most far-reaching character. There were already buccaneers, English, French and Dutch in plenty in the West Indies; and the fear that Virginia would be just one more nest of pirates haunted the Spanish mind. But the mature determination and purpose of those who received the King's Letters Patent for this colony was the spread of the English dominion, carrying with it English liberty, and the English Church into the New World, and there to contest with Spain her claim of the Western Hemisphere. Their Letters Patent guaranteed to the colonists and to their heirs forever all the liberties, franchises and immunities of Englishmen, born and abiding in England. The third article of their Letters Patent reads: "We, greatly commending and graciously accepting of their desires for the furtherance of so noble a work, which may, by the providence of Almighty God, hereafter tend to the glory of His Divine Majesty, in propagating of Christian religion to such people as yet live in darkness and miserable ignorance of the true knowledge and worship of God, and may in time bring the infidels and savages living in those parts to human civility and a settled and quiet government; do," etc.

In the instructions given to the colonists, it is provided that the President, Council and ministers shall "with all diligence, care and respect provide that the true Word and service of God and Christian faith be preached, planted and used, not only within every of the said several colonies and plantations, but also as much as they may amongst the savage people who doe or shall adjoin unto them, or border upon them, according to the doctrine, rights and religion now professed and established within our realm of England."

A most important characteristic of the Colony of Virginia is that it was founded before those divisions, political and relgious, arose which brought on the great civil war in the reign of Charles I. The colony was shaped and directed by the most liberal and advanced statesmen of their day; and as it developed they sought and gained for Virginia more liberty than James I finally approved; and on this account he revoked the liberal charter granted in 1612. But the character of the colony remained that of a representative English Colony, and, from the first, Englishmen of all opinions allowed in England came naturally to Virginia, and they continued to do so. It represented the integrity of Old England and not a sect or faction of any sort, civil or ecclesiastical. They brought no grievance, they nursed no bitter memories, they were infected with no morbid tendencies, but only such as are common to men. It was a genuinely representative piece of Old England set down in the New World—ranging in rank in the first company of colonists from "Gentlemen," like "Master Edward Maria Wingfield" and the "Honorable George Percy," a brother of the then Earl of Northumberland, down to "Nat Peacock" and "Dick Mutton," "boyes," as we still call our nondescript young servants. And among them all moved that man of God, their minister, the Rev. Robert Hunt, whose unselfish fortitude and endurance, as well as his "good doctrine and exhortation," more than once reconciled them in their difficulties among themselves; "chiefly by his own devoted example, quenching those flames of envy and dissension."

All agree in praising him. John Smith calls him "an honest, religious, courageous divine; during whose life our factions were oft qualified, and our wants and greatest extremities so comforted that they seemed easie in comparison of what we endured after his memorable death."

It is recorded of him that during the six weeks the ships were kept in sight of England, "all which time Master Hunt, our preacher, was so weake and sick, that few expected his recovery. Yet, although he were but twentie myles from his habitation (the time we were in the downs), (from which we infer that his home must have been in Kent), and notwithstanding the stormy weather, nor the scandalous imputations (of some few, little better than Atheists, of the greatest ranke among us) suggested against him, all this could never force from him so much as a seeming desire to leave the business, but preferred the service of God in so good a voyage, before any affection to contest with his godlesse foes, whose disastrous designes (could they have prevailed) had even then overthrowne the business, so many discontents did then arise, had he not, with the water of patience and his godly exhortations (but chiefly through his true devoted examples) quenched those flames of envie and dissension."

On Sunday morning early, the 26th of April, corresponding to the 6th of May, as the calendar is now corrected, the colonists entered Chesapeake Bay, and landed on the southern shore.

It was the third Sunday after Easter, and if on the ships or on the shore that day the service was read, as it is probable that it was, the appropriateness of the epistle for the day, beginning with 1 Peter 2:11, and warning them "as strangers and pilgrims," to practice self-discipline, to submit to authority, and live in love, must have impressed those who heard it.

To this same point they returned three days later, on Wednesday, April 29, the day after they had found the channel at Old Point, and knew that they could enter the river. Then, after the revered fashion of old Christian explorers and discoverers, they set up a cross at the spot of their first landing, and called that place Cape Henry.

After two weeks of exploration and examination, of which an interesting account is given by George Percy, they finally determined upon an island adjacent to the north bank of the river and forty miles from its mouth.

To this place they came on May 13, and the next day, Thursday, 14, all hands were brought ashore and set to clearing ground for their settlement and making ready timber for their stockade fort. This stockade was triangular, "having bulwarks at each corner like a half-moon, and four or five pieces of artillery mounted in them." The side next the river was 420 feet long and the two other sides each 300 feet long. A road ran all around on the inside next the stockade, and next to the road and facing inwards were the cabins occupied by the colonists. In the open space in the middle of the triangle stood the guardhouse, the storehouse, and when it was built, which was within a few weeks, the church. The settlement was at the upper or western end of the island.

"Now," to quote Captain Smith, "because I have spoke so much of the body, give me leave to say somewhat of the soule; and the rather because I have been demanded by so many how we began to preach the gospel in Virginia, and by what authority; what churches we had, our order of service, and maintenance of our ministers; therefore, I think it not amisse to satisfie their demands, it being the mother of all our Plantations, intreating pride to spare laughter to understand her simple beginnings and proceedings.

"When we first went to Virginia, I well remember, we did hang an awning (which is an old saile) to three or four trees, to shadow us from the sunne; our walles were rales of wood; our seats unhewed trees till we cut plankes; our pulpit a bar of wood nailed to two neighbouring trees. In foule weather we shifted into an old rotten tent; for we had few better, and this came by way of adventure for new.

"This was our church till we built a homely thing like a barne, set upon cratchets, covered with rafts, sedge and earth; so was the walls. The best of our houses (were) of like curiosity; but the most part far much worse workmanship, that neither could well defend (from) wind nor raine. Yet we had daily Common Prayer, morning and evening; every Sunday two sermons; and every three months the Holy Communion, till our minister died; but our prayers daily with an Homily on Sundaies we continued two or three years after till our preachers came"—that is, the next preacher to come after the death of Mr. Hunt.

Here is a true picture of the beginning of Church life in America. The pioneers, working in the summer heat, building a fort, clearing ground, planting corn, getting out clapboard and specimens of timber to send back to England, with sassafras roots and other crude products of the land.

Sunday comes, and they leave their tools, but still taking their arms, they gather under the "old saile" to shadow them from the sun while they hear the familiar words of Common Prayer, and the cheering exhortations of their man of God.

There, doubtless, the first celebration of the Holy Communion was held on Sunday, the 21st of June, 1607, corresponding to July 1 in our calendar. It was the Third Sunday after Trinity; and the next day the ships were going back to England. Note again the appropriateness of the epistle, 1 Peter 5:5, etc.: "All of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility, for God resisteth the proud and giveth grace unto the humble. Humble yourselves, therefore, under the mighty hand of God that He may exalt you in due time. Casting all your care upon Him, for He careth for you."

THE CHURCH BUILDINGS AT JAMESTOWN

By the Rev. Corbin Braxton Bryan, D. D.

The first church building of the Church of England in America was set up on Jamestown Island by the hands of the first voyagers and colonists, a few weeks after they had landed in 1607. It was "a homely thing like a barn, set upon cratchets, covered with rafts, sedge and earth."

This poor little building of logs, covered with turf and sedges, lasted only about six months. Early in January, 1608, just after Newport's return from England, bringing supplies of men and provisions, the town caught fire and the reed thatching of the huts and church made a fire "so fierce as it burned their pallizadoes (although ten or twelve yardes distant) with their armes, bedding, apparel and much private provision. Good Master Hunt, our preacher, lost all his library, and all that he had but the clothes on his backe, yet (did) none ever see him repine at his losse." Newport came to their help, and while the men were repairing the storehouse and other buildings, Newport's mariners rebuilt the church, probably on the site of the old one; and this is the second church built, and, like the first, it was a hurriedly-constructed and poor affair.

These two churches are the only ones which Captain John Smith knew in Virginia, for he returned to England in October, 1609. Hunt had then been already some months dead.

It witnessed the horrible "starving time" of the winter and spring of 1609-10, and saw the abandonment of Jamestown in June, 1610, when Sir Thomas Gates and Sir George Somers found the colony at the last gasp, and took them aboard their ships to carry them back to England—a bitter trial after all that had been endured. And evidently it was God's will that Virginia should be tried, but it was not His will that she should be abandoned. When the ships were actually going down the river, word came to them that Lord De la Warr was lying at Old Point Comfort with abundant reinforcements and supplies. Virginia was not abandoned, but rescued in the nick of time. With the coming of Lord De la Warr and a well-selected company of emigrants, a new and more hopeful era opened for the colony. As for the church, although only two and a half years old, it was already in very bad condition. But De la Warr, a deeply pious man, took much pains in repairing it. Strachey gives a bright picture of the church and its worshippers: "The Captaine General hath given order for the repairing of (the church) and at this instant many hands are about it. It is in length three score foote, in breadth twenty-foure, and shall have a chancell in it of cedar, with faire broad windowes, to shut and open as the weather shall occasion, of the same wood, a pulpit of the same, with a font hewen hollow like a canoa, with two bels at the West end. It is so cast as to be very light within, and the Lord Governour and Captaine General doth cause it to be kept passing sweete, and trimmed up with divers flowers, with a sexton belonging to it; and in it every Sunday we have Sermons twice a day, and Thursday a sermon, having true (two?) preachers which take their weekly turns; and every morning at the ringing of a bell about ten of the clocke each man addresseth himself to prayers, and so at foure of the clocke before supper. Every Sunday, when the Lord Governour and Captaine General goeth to church, he is accompanied with all the Counsailers, Captaines and other Officers, and all the Gentlemen, with a guard of Halberdiers, in his Lordship's Livery, faire red cloakes, to the number of fifty, both on each side and behind him: and being in the church his Lordship hath his seat in the Quier, in a green velvet chair, with a cloath, with a velvet cushion spread on a table before him on which he kneeleth, and on each side sit the Counsel, Captaines and officers, each in their place, and when he returneth home again he is waited on to his house in the same manner."

Here is great punctilio and formality; but withal De la Warr Somers and Gates were men of profound piety. Religion was not a matter of ceremonies and services with them, but was the foundation of their lives. They were of the sort that "next to God loved a good fight," but they loved both truly, and God was ever first.

In 1617 Captain Argall arrived in Jamestown, and served as deputy governor. He found the church which De la Warr had renovated again in ruins, and services being conducted in a storehouse. Some time during his tenure of office—i. e., between 1617 and 1619—a new church was built at Jamestown, "wholly at the charge of the inhabitants of that cittie, of timber, being fifty foot in length and twenty feet in breadth"; and this time the site was removed, and the new church was placed to the eastward of the old stockade (outside of it) and in the midst of or ajacent to the rueful graveyard, where so many victims of hunger, heat, cold, fever, and massacre lay buried. It was erected upon a slender cobblestone and brick foundation, only the length of one brick in thickness. This foundation was discovered by the careful explorations of the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities in 1891, and lies within the foundations of the next building, that is, of the one the tower of which is now standing. This slender foundation of the church, built between 1617 and 1619, is the oldest structure which has been discovered at Jamestown. It was within this little building that the first House of Burgesses met in July, 1619—the first representative body of English lawmakers to assemble in America. And "forasmuche as men's affaires doe little prosper where God's service is neglected, all the Burgesses stood in their places, until a prayer was said by Mr. Bucke that it would please God to guide and santifie all our proceedings to His own glory and the good of the Plantation." Then the small, but august body of Burgesses was organized, and the first laws passed in America by a representative body were then enacted for the regulation both of the Church and of the State.

How long this little building, the third church, lasted and was used, we do not know, but in 1639, January 18th, the statement is made in a letter from the Governor, Sir John Harvey, and the Council in Virginia, to the Privy Council in London, that "Such hath bene our Indevour herein, that out of our owne purses we have largely contributed to the building of a brick church, and both masters of ships, and others of the ablest Planters have liberally by our persuasion underwritt to this worke." As this letter was dated January 18th, it may be that the church was finished that year, but there is no definite statement as to this.

The same letter makes mention of the first brick house at Jamestown, which was the residence of Secretary Richard Kemp. It was but sixteen by twenty-four feet in dimensions, but Governor Harvey speaks of it as "the fairest ever known in this country for substance and uniformity." This fourth church, built by Governor Harvey, stood and was used until September, 1676, when it was burned along with the rest of Jamestown by Nathaniel Bacon and his men. But it is most probable that the tower and walls stood, and that when Jamestown was partially rebuilt between 1676 and 1686, that the original tower and walls built by Harvey about 1639, were repaired and used. Thus repaired, the church continued to be used for many years. After 1699 the meetings of the House of Burgesses were no longer held in Jamestown, but removed to Williamsburg, and the residents at Jamestown became very few, and the congregation of the church at Jamestown was correspondingly diminished.

The last minister in the old church was certainly Bishop James Madison, who served the parish from 1785 to 1812. The old church was in ruins before 1812, and the last services in the parish were held in a brick church a few miles off on the road to Williamsburg, called "The Main" Church—that is, the church on the main land as distinguished from the island. This church has now disappeared.

The font of the old church and its interesting communion vessels were taken to Bruton church, in the new Colonial capital at Williamsburg, where they are still carefully preserved.

The old tower has kept its lonely watch for more than an hundred years. After long and inexcusable neglect it is now strengthened and guarded. Long may it stand. The principles, the heroic perseverance, the sufferings, which the very ground of Jamestown brings to mind, together with the imperishable fruits and blessings which went out to the New World from this first English settlement, have their fittest monument in the tower of the church which, in the providence of God, was appointed to bring the everlasting gospel to these shores.

OLD BRUTON PARISH CHURCH IN WILLIAMSBURG

By the Rev. W. A. R. Goodwin, D. D.

Bruton Parish Church bears witness to the continuity of the life of the Church established at Jamestown in 1607. The history of its beginning and early life lies in that period of obscurity occasioned by the destruction and loss of the written records of the church and the county courts of Virginia. From what remains we learn that in 1632 Middle Plantation (subsequently Williamsburg) was "laid out and paled in" seven miles inland from Jamestown in the original county of James City, and shortly thereafter a parish bearing the plantation name was created. In 1644 a parish in James City County, called "Harrop," was established, which, on April 1, 1648, was united with Middle Plantation Parish, forming the parish of Middletown. In 1674 the parish of Marston (established in York County in 1654) and Middletown Parish were united under the name Bruton Parish. The source from which the name was derived is suggested by the inscription on the tomb of Sir Thomas Ludwell, which lies at the entrance of the north transept door, which states that he was born "at Bruton, in the county of Summerset, in the Kingdom of England, and departed this life in the year 1678."

There was a church building in Williamsburg in 1665, which in 1674 had come to be known as the "Old Church." This fact is established by an entry in the vestry book of Middlesex Parish, which directs that a church be built in that parish, "after the model of the one in Williamsburg." How long this building had been in use is not known, but it had grown old in 1674, at which time the new vestry book opens with the order under date, "April ye 18th," that a "new church be built with brick att ye Middle Plantation." Land sufficient for the church and churchyard was given by Colonel John Page, together with twenty pounds sterling to aid in erection of the building. The beginning of Church life in this building, the foundations of which were unearthed during the excavations made in 1905, is noted in the quaint entry under date "November ye 29th, 1683: Whereas, ye Brick Church at Middle Plantation is now finished, It is ordered yt all ye Inhabitants of ye said Parish do for the future repair thither to hear Divine Service and ye Word of God preached; And that Mr. Rowland Jones, Minister, do dedicate ye said Church ye sixth of January next, being ye Epiphany."

The records of this period tell of the "old Communion Table," which is to be removed to the minister's house and there remain; of the purchase of a "Ring of Bells"; of fees paid in tobacco for registering official acts, and for digging graves in the church aisle and chancel, and of "ye sum of Sixteen Thousand Six Hundred and Sixty-Six pounds of Tobacco and Caske," to be paid annually to Mr. Rowland Jones, minister. Colonel John Page has accorded to him "the privilege to sett a pew for himself and family in the Chancell of the New Church," while the rest of the congregation is made subject to the order "that ye Men sit on the North side of the Church and ye Women on the left." Later on it is ordered that "Ye Gallery be assigned for the use of the College Youth" of William and Mary, to which gallery there is to be "put a door, with a lock and key, the sexton to keep the key."

Bruton Parish Church, upon the removal of the seat of government from Jamestown to Williamsburg in 1699, succeeded to the prestige which pertained to the church of the capital of the colony. From this time there grew about the church an environment of ever-increasing interest, and about it gathered an atmosphere which, with the passing years, has caught and reflects the light of other days.

The county road which ran by the churchyard, marking the inward and outward march of English civilization, now rose to the dignity of the Duke of Gloucester Street. The newly-designed yard and gardens of the Governor's palace swept down along the east wall of the church. In spacious yards adjacent rose the stately homes of the Virginia gentry who had resorted to the capital. Nearby towered the walls of the College of William and Mary and the halls of the Virginia House of Burgesses, and facing each other on the open green stood the Court of Justice and the octagon Powder Horn. The church had become the Court Church of Colonial Virginia. His Excellency, the Governor, attended by his Council of State, and surrounded by the members of the House of Burgesses, gave to the church an official distinction and a position of unique importance.

The old brick building of 1674 soon became inadequate to the needs of the situation, and in 1710, during the rectorship of the Reverend Commissary James Blair, D. D., it was determined that a new church should be built.

This building, which was completed in 1715, has remained continuously in use and has well withstood the rough usages of war and the devastating touch of time. Its ministers, as shown from contemporaneous records, were, without a single exception, men of superior culture and godly piety. Most of them were Masters of Arts from the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, or full graduates of the College of William and Mary, and that they served the cause of Christ with devotion and fidelity is attested in every instance by resolutions of the vestry.

Official distinction was recognized and emphasized in the church. To His Excellency the Governor and His Council of State was assigned a pew elevated from the floor, overhung with a red velvet canopy, around which his name was emblazoned in letters of gold, the name being changed as Spotswood, Drysdale, Gooch, Dinwiddie, Fauquier, Lord Botetourt and Lord Dunmore succeeded to office. In the square pews of the transepts sat the members of the House of Burgesses, the pews in the choir being assigned to the Surveyor-General and the parish rector, while in the overhanging galleries in the transepts and along the side walls of the church sat the Speaker of the House of Burgesses and other persons of wealth and distinction, to whom the privilege of erecting these private galleries was accorded from time to time.

With the approach of the American Revolution the services in Old Bruton assumed a tone of tenderness and thrilling interest, unique in character and fervent with power. Men, as they listened to the proclamation of the gospel of redemption, saw clearer the vision of liberty and felt a deeper need of the guidance and help of God. Washington makes mention in his diary of attending services here, and adds, "And fasted all day." A contemporaneous letter, written by one of the congregation to a friend in London, tells of the intensity of grief and the depth of feeling manifested in the service held by order of the government when news reached America that Parliament had passed the "Stamp Act." The church, it was said, would not begin to hold the people who thronged to attend the service. These people loved old England, and were bound to her by material interests and by ties of blood. They wanted to continue to honor and obey the civil authority, and to pray for their King, and they thronged to these services in old Bruton to express their faith and devotion and the passionate longing of their lives for justice, liberty and peace, and today the old church is hallowed by the memory of these prayers which rose from bleeding hearts to our fathers' God and our God, through the Liturgy which we use and love the more for these associations by which it is hallowed and enriched. In the eventide, when the parting glory of the day falls like a benediction and lingers in the old church, the old scenes come like a vision before the illumined imagination. Upon bended knee we seem to see that noble band of patriot legislators—Nelson, Wythe, Harrison, Braxton, the Lees, Cabells, Cary, Carr, Carrington, Carter, Nicholas, Norvell, Richard Bland, George Mason, Edmund Pendleton, Peyton Randolph, Patrick Henry, George Washington and the rest, and the walls seem again to echo back their supplication to the King of kings—"We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord."

The old Prayer Book, which bears the inscription, "Bruton Parish, 1756," bears witness through erasures and marginal insertions to answered prayers. The Prayer for the President is pasted over the Prayer for King George III., while the prejudice engendered by the passions of men is evidenced by a line run through the words "King of kings," and the marginal insertion, "Ruler of the Universe." The Bible of this period is also preserved, together with the old parish register, containing the name of George Washington eleven times, and telling of the baptism of 1,122 negro servants within a period of twenty-five years, with many pages of the record of this period missing.

Besides these, the church is the inheritor and custodian of other sacred memorials of the past. The old Jamestown baptismal font and communion silver are still in use at Bruton Parish Church, together with a set of communion silver, made in 1686, given by Lady Gooch to the College of William and Mary, and a set bearing the royal arms of King George III.

It seems almost incredible that the need of a Sunday school room should have led the congregation in 1840 to yield to the spirit of innovation and destroy, as they did, the interior form and appearance of the church, but at this time a partition wall was built across the church; the high corner pulpit, the colonial pews and the flagstone chancel and aisles were removed; the chancel, which enshrined the graves of Orlando Jones, progenitor of Mrs. Martha Washington; the graves of the Blairs and Monroes, and of Rev. Dr. William H. Wilmer, was removed from its ancient place in the east end of the church and affixed to the wall of partition, and the interior of the building furnished and decorated in modern style with money secured by a church fair.

The work of restoration inaugurated on May 15, 1905, by a sermon preached by Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, D. D., now Bishop of the Diocese of Southern Virginia, has been planned and executed with absolute fidelity to Colonial type and historic verity, with the endeavor to reproduce the form and feeling of the past. The foundations and roof timbers have been renewed; a shingle tile roof covers the building, and an iron and concrete floor safeguards it from dampness and fire. The tower woodwork, together with the clock originally in the House of Burgesses, have been restored, and the bell, engraved, "The gift of James Tarpley to Bruton Parish, 1761," again rings out the passing hours. The high pulpit with overhanging sounding boards stands again at the southeast corner and is a memorial to the Rev. Commissary James Blair, D. D., and the other clergy of the Colonial period. The chancel has regained its place in the east, and, with the aisles, is paved with white marble in which are set tombstones appropriately inscribed to mark the graves discovered during the process of excavation. Of the twenty-eight graves found in the aisles nine were identified by letters and dates made by driving brass tacks in the wood of the coffin. Among the graves thus marked with marble slabs are those of Governor Francis Fauquier, Governor Edmund Jennings, and Dr. William Cocke, Secretary of State.

The Bible given by King Edward VII and the lectern presented by President Roosevelt are in memory of the three hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the English Church and English civilization in America.

Preserved and restored, the old church is typical of the strong and simple architectural designs of the Colonial period, and a witness to the faith and devotion of the nation builders. Rising from amid the sculptured tombs of the honored dead who lie beneath the shadows of its walls, old Bruton stands, as the Bishop of Southern Virginia has said, "The noblest monument of religion in America."

WANTED: A CLERGYMAN FOR WORK IN ALASKA.

Mr. Editor: Bishop Rowe has written me, asking me to endeavor to locate, or help him locate, a clergyman for the work at Fairbanks, Alaska. As a Southern man who has served five years in that field, I should like to lay it especially before some of the younger clergy of the South, in the hope that one of them may be moved to give at least five years to that work. Mrs. Lumpkin and I count the five years we spent in Fairbanks as five of the happiest we ever lived. We learned much. We met and grew to know and love many of the splendid types of manhood and womanhood that the North produces. While one will not find a great city in which to serve, they would find a field which gives opportunity for every expression of a clergyman's life. Our people there want it. The Guild has held together for two years, doing their work, and keeping up their interest. They are praying that a man be sent to them. The present judge of the Federal Court will probably be a Churchman; the past one was, and is now the elected head of the new Alaska Agricultural College and School of Mines, located at Fairbanks. We have a number of other outstanding men and women there. They need and want the ministrations of the Church. If this should stir the interest of any clergyman to volunteer, I shall be glad to give him all the information that I can, and I am sure that Mr. John W. Wood, of the Board, would likewise be glad to help him to any knowledge he may desire of that field.

THE CHURCH'S PRESENT CRISIS.

Mr. Editor: Let the clergy come to the front in this matter of the Church's crisis. Say that out of five or six thousand clergymen we have four thousand who would, beginning with the first of October, give a tenth of their monthly income for the following four months. Say the average would be ten dollars per month, this would mean forty thousand dollars for each month; this multiplied by four would make by the last payment, the first of January, one hundred and sixty thousand dollars. If the clergy will take the lead, there is no telling what the laity will do! Hard? Well, suppose it is? The Church cannot be forsaken. Think of the missionaries abroad and those in the home field (the latter, and possibly the former, would, of course, be contributors), and is not this enough, to say nothing of the other interests, to stir the soul to its very depths of any one who loves the Church?

MARTIN DAMER.

Nampa, Idaho.

(Are not our clergy already doing this, not only four months, but twelve months out of every year? We are sure that it is a rule with very many of them.—Ed. S. C.)

"SIGNS AND WONDERS."

The signs that follow the missionary today have just as much evidence of a divine presence and of divine forces at work with Him as those seen by the early Church. When we heard of some bitter Moslem turning to worship the Son of God, or some proud Brahmin, counting all things lost for the excellency of the Knowledge of Jesus Christ the Lord, or some poor pagan cleansed from loathsome vice and superstition, are we not face to face with facts which are just as truly "signs and wonders" as those which were wrought in apostolic times? And they can easily be explained in the same way.—H. E. Fox.

COMMUNITY FAIR.

Has it ever been Fair Day in your parish, Mr. Country Parson?

If it hasn't, it should be pretty soon. A church fair is one of the finest ways of arousing interest in the church, bringing country people together, and generally encouraging rural people to take more interest in the parish activities.

When we say "church fair" we do not mean a bazaar or sale, but a real fair with exhibits and blue ribbons and red ribbons and prizes just like a State or county fair, except that it is given under the auspices of the church, with various committees of the congregation in charge of the numerous departments.

We present a picture this week of some of the exhibits made at the fair given a few weeks ago by Emmanuel Church, Brook Hill, Va., Rev. E. E. Osgood, rector.

We quote from the program, thinking that it may be helpfully suggestive to others who want to try something of this sort:

RULES AND REGULATIONS.

1. ENTRY REQUIREMENTS.
   (a) Eligible applicants shall be members of Emmanuel Parish congregation, or of the neighborhood.
   (b) All entries shall be made not later than September 15.
2. RULES FOR EXHIBITS.
   (a) All exhibits shall be in place not later than 10 A. M. September 29.
   (b) All exhibits shall remain in place until the conclusion of the fair.
   (c) Exhibits entered for prizes shall be subject to the regulations of their department.
3. PREMIUMS AND REWARDS.
   (a) All prizes shall be awarded on the individual worth of exhibits.
   (b) There shall be only one prize of material value offered for each kind of exhibit.
   (c) A blue ribbon may be awarded in place of a second prize if so determined by the judges.
4. JUDGES AND JUDGING.
   (a) There shall be two judges for each exhibit.
   (b) Should there be a tie a third judge shall be called in to decide.
   (c) Judges shall be selected with the view to strict impartiality in their decision.
5. DEPARTMENTS.
   (a) There shall be five departments designated as A, B, C, D, E.
   (b) Department "A"—The Flower Festival.
   Department "B"—Farm Products.
   Department "C"—Housewives.
   Department "D"—Arts and Crafts.
   Department "E"—Poultry.

PROGRAM FOR EACH DAY.

Thursday.

1:00 P. M.—Opening.
2:00 P. M.—Demonstration of Exhibits.
3:30 P. M.—Addresses by Prominent Speakers.
5:00 P. M.—Field Games.
6:30 P. M.—Refreshment Hour.
8:00 P. M.—Pageant—"The Community Spirit."

Friday.

1:00 P. M.—Demonstration of Exhibits.
3:00 P. M.—Addresses by Prominent Speakers.
4:30 P. M.—Field Games.
6:00 P. M.—Refreshment Hour.
8:00 P. M.—Minstrels.
9:00 P. M.—Indian and Gypsy Shows.
10:00 P. M.—Closing.

The program in this case was first arranged for one day, but the interest was so great, and so many more exhibits came in than were expected, that it was found best to extend the whole thing over two days.

Emmanuel Church has a large parish house, and it was filled with a splendid exhibit of farm products, preserves, pickles, breads, cakes and all kinds of handcraft work.

The pageant, "Community Spirit," was written by Mrs. Osgood for the occasion, she having taken a special course in pageantry at Wellesley College last summer. It was given in the open air, where a gentle slope with a wooded background made a natural amphitheatre; such places are easily found in the country, and make a beautiful background for bright-colored costumes. The latter can be procured at very moderate cost by getting ordinary white cheese cloth and dying it the desired colors.

Of course, all of this means work and planning, but real constructive work is what most of our Church people are eager for.

Send Gifts Now for Lepers' Christmas.

Of the thousand or more leper people in the United States, there are many to whom the ministry of "holiday greetings" would bring untold brightness. The "Federal Hospital, No. 66," for the exclusive use of the leper people of the United States, has at last been located through the purchase by the government of the Louisiana Leper Home, comprising a tract of land of more than four hundred acres. All that medical skill can do in their behalf will be provided. Would you like to add to their comforts by joining other friends in making a Christmas shower in their behalf? If so, drop a card to W. M. Danner, American Secretary to the Mission to Lepers, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, and ask for a letter as to what would be most acceptable and when and where to send. Thousands of other leper people living in the leper homes connected with the Mission to Lepers in many lands would eagerly welcome holiday messages from friends in this land.

The most needed articles are soap, blankets and sandals. (Bandages, medical supplies, food and clothing, of course, are always in demand.) The articles should not be sent if it is possible to send money instead, as special arrangements are being made to secure the articles on the ground.

The society makes an urgent appeal for these gifts so that every worker among the lepers, and every leper under the Christian care of the mission, shall know they were remembered by the people in America at Christmas time.

Offerings for this lepers' Christmas Day are now being received and acknowledged by Mr. Fleming H. Revell, Treasurer, the American Mission to Lepers, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Bible for Disarament Conference.

The New York Bible Society announces that word has been received from President Harding that he will be glad to accept a Bible presented by the Society for the disarmament conference. The Bible is beautifully bound in morocco and with large type. It is one of the finest copies of the Scriptures published, and will be engrossed on the outside within a panel, as follows:

"This Bible is presented to the conference for limitation of armaments, and is dedicated to the promotion of good will among the nations by the New York Bible Society. November 11, 1921."

Body of Corporal Henckell Brought From France.

Church rectories bore their toll of sacrifice in the World War in common with all other homes. It was the sad duty of receiving the body of his son, Corporal Emil Henckell, from the War Department, which took Rev. Carl Henckell, of Grace Church, Birmingham, Ala., to New York recently. Mr. Henckell is one of the Alabama diocesan missionaries. Corporal Henckell, who was just twenty-five, was killed on July 26, 1918, at Chateau Thierry. He was a member of the One Hundred and Sixty-seventh Infantry. His lieutenant colonel wrote to his father:

"Emil was attached to my staff as a member of the intelligence section, a body of men picked for their bravery and intelligence. No braver man ever wore the uniform of our country than your son. He was with me almost daily, and I feel that I am in a position to know. It should be a great consolation to you to have given to our country so brave a man, one who made the supreme sacrifice with a smile on his face. He never showed the slightest fear in the face of danger. He was given the most dangerous assignments, filling them with honor and credit to himself and our regiment."

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Eastern Convocation.

The fiftieth semi-annual meeting of the Eastern Convocation of the Diocese of West Virginia was held in Trinity Church, Shepherdstown, September 20-22.

The opening service on Tuesday evening was well attended, and the sermon by the dean, the Rev. A. B. Mitchell, was heard with interest and profit by a good congregation.

On Wednesday morning there was a celebration of the Holy Communion by the Bishop of the Diocese, and a sermon by the Rev. Conrad H. Goodwin. Mr. Goodwin reviewed the work of the American Church during the past one hundred years of her life, and plead for larger vision and greater effort in the fulfilling of her mission.

The evening service on Wednesday was particularly a laymen's service, and the Rev. Robert B. Nelson, of Winchester, who was good enough to come over and help, spoke on "The Relation of the Church to the Community as a Challenge to Laymen," and his address was an inspiration to all for a more practical application of Christianity to the social life of the community.

After Morning Prayer on Thursday the Rev. Dudley Boogher, of Martinsburg, preached from John 17:19, "For their sakes I sanctify myself," emphasizing the need of personal sanctification as a means and preparation for better social service work.

The closing service of Convocation, always missionary in nature, was held on Thursday evening, at which time Archdeacon Chrisman spoke on "The Need and Opportunity for Extending the Church in the Diocese." Mr. Chrisman's first hand knowledge of conditions in the troubled mining sections of the State enabled him to present with force the need for Church extension in those sections of the Diocese, and her wonderful present-day opportunity to fulfil her mission. At this service the dean, in well chosen words, expressed the appreciation of Convocation for the delightful hospitality accorded by the good people of Trinity Church and of Shepherdstown. The delightful luncheons served on Wednesday and Thursday at noon in the College Hall shall long be remembered by the members of Convocation, and by the women of the Auxiliary in attendance at the convocational meeting.

The two afternoons of Convocation were devoted to business sessions. Parochial reports showed progress in the work generally, and an encouraging outlook for the fall and winter. On Wednesday afternoon the Rev. S. Roger Tyler, of Huntington, chairman of the Nation-Wide Campaign for the Diocese, outlined the plans of the Central Committee for the fall campaign, and urged their enthusiastic adoption in the parishes of the Diocese. At this session the annual election of officers was held, the Rev. Dudley Boogher, of Martinsburg, being elected Dean; the Rev. A. B. Mitchell, of Charles Town, Secretary, and the Rev. Conrad H. Goodwin, of Charles Town, Treasurer.

At the Thursday afternoon session plans were made for the extension of the work and for a larger representation of laymen in the work and sessions of Convocation.

Simultaneous with this session the annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was held in Trinity Church. This meeting was largely attended by representatives from the various branches of the Convocation. Its splendid attendance and interesting program bore testimony to the wise planning and untiring efforts of the convocational secretary, Mrs. A. B. Mitchell, of Charles Town.

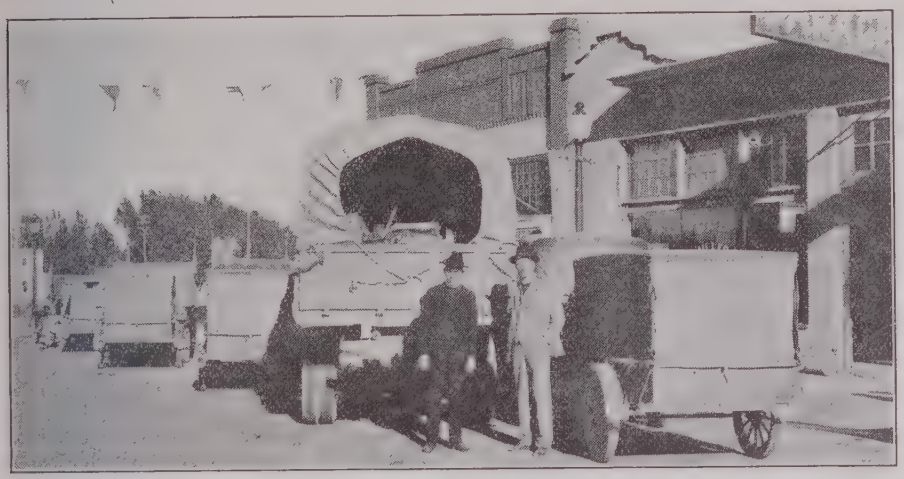
SPOKANE

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Herman Page is now provincial head of the Church for the Eighth Province. The honor was conferred on him at the recent Synodical meeting of the Eighth Province at Salt Lake City. The Eighth Province, which takes in all of the district west of the Rockies, is probably the largest of the eight provinces into which the United States has been divided. The Synodical meeting was attended by some fifteen active bishops, as well as many of the clergy and laity.



The Spokane Church Normal School, which is under the Department of Religious Education, of which the Rev. B. A. Warren, of Walla Walla, is chairman, has commenced its work under the superintendency of the Rev. H. I. Oberholtzer, Director of Religious Education for both the District of Spokane and the Diocese of Olympia. The principal is the Rev. Lindley H. Miller, vicar of St. Peter's, Spokane, whose special work will be that of instructing on "Child Nature." The faculty consists of local Church school teachers, with the assistance of Deaconess Christable Corbett. The course will consist of two periods of five evenings each, meeting on Monday evenings at All Saints' Parish House, Spokane.

A most successful Sunday School Institute was held at Wenatchee recently, and lectures given by the Rev. H. I. Oberholtzer, of Tacoma, and the Rev. Herman Riddle Page, of Okanogan.

The new parish hall of St. David's Church, Lidgerwood, Spokane, is now completed, and being a much-needed accommodation, will help to advance the work of this mission, of which the Rev. John G. Larsen, vicar of Epiphany, Hillyard, is in charge.

Archdeacon George H. Severance has returned to the District with his bride, and will make his headquarters at Spokane, and in the taking up of his various appointments, will be assisted by the Rev. Turpin Daughters, formerly of Ritzville, and the Rev. Henry J. Gurr, formerly of Chelan, who will both make their home at Spokane. Mrs. G. H. Severance attended the Deaconess Training School at Philadelphia, and is well qualified to render such assistance to her husband as occasion may require.

IDAHO.

Rt. Rev. F. H. Touret, D. D., Bishop.

The Church Welcomes Homesteaders.

The Rev. Charles Glenn Baird, minister in charge of the Church of the Ascension, Twin Falls, recently went to the neighboring town of Buhl on a very unique mission. It was to extend the welcome of the Church to twenty-eight families of homesteaders who have arrived on the Roseworth tract in Southern Idaho to make their home. These families compose what is known as Scott's Modern Caravan, and the colony is made up almost entirely of families from Brooklyn, N. Y. The trip from the eastern seaboard has been made in automobiles, making a striking contrast to the prairie-schooner caravans which came to the mountain West a half-century ago. The journey required seven weeks, and covered 3,400 miles. Mr. Baird made a religious census of the members of the caravan the very evening on which they arrived in Buhl—the nearest town to the Roseworth project—and discovered ten Episcopal families out of a total of twenty-eight. Our Church has the largest claim upon them of any of the churches, and it is quite likely that a small church building will be erected at Roseworth in the near future. Though he is stationed forty miles away, the Rev. Mr. Baird, with the enthusiastic support of the Bishop of Idaho, will make every effort to give regular ministrations to this group of pioneers.

St. Mark's Church, Moscow, located at the seat of the University of Idaho, has recently spent over $400 on repairs to the rectory and parish house. The fund was raised entirely by the women of the parish. The parish plant is now fairly well equipped to minister to the large number of Episcopal students who are attending the University this year. But out of a total of eight hundred and fifty students—the largest enrollment in the history of the institution—eighty-eight are communicants of our church, or more than one-tenth.

ERIE.

Rev. Jno. C. Ward, Bishop-Elect.

The Rev. John C. Ward Consecrated Bishop of Erie.

In Grace Church, Buffalo, N. Y., in the presence of a congregation which packed the church to the doors, the Rev. John Chamberlain Ward was consecrated Bishop of the Diocese of Erie on September 22d.

More than one hundred and twenty-five bishops and other clergy attended the services, and the scene presented was one of great beauty as the long procession made up of the choir, color guard, wardens and vestry of Grace Church, lay members of the Standing Committees of Erie and of Western New York, the clergy, the visiting bishops and the consecrators, entered the church. A thrilling tribute to the new Bishop was the presence in the procession of twenty former service men in uniform representing the army, navy and marine corps, acting as a guard of honor to the colors borne by Sergeant Clifford Raines, formerly of the One Hundred and Eighth Infantry, with Private Emil A. John, the Bishop-elect's secretary, formerly of the Seventh United States Infantry, and Able Seaman Charles Purcell, as color guards. The sight of these former comrades brought vividly to mind the battle-torn fields of France, when Chaplain Ward was severely wounded while ministering to the men of his regiment, where his bravery under terrific fire won for him the American medal of honor and the British military cross.

The consecration service began promptly at 10:30 o'clock, the Rt. Rev. Daniel S. Tuttle, D. D., LL. D., presiding. Co-consecrators were the Rt. Rev. Cortland Whitehead, D. D., Bishop of Pittsburgh, Pa., and the Rt. Rev. Boyd Vincent, D. D., Bishop of Southern Ohio; presenting bishops, the Rt. Rev. David Lincoln Ferris, D. D., Bishop Suffragan of Western New York, and the Rt. Rev. Wilson R. Stearly, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Newark, N. J.; preacher, the Rt. Rev. Charles Henry Brent, D. D., Bishop of Western New York; attending presbyters, the Rev. Walter Russell Lord, rector of St. John's Church, Buffalo, and the Rev. Martin Aigner, D. D., of Franklin, Pa., president of the Standing Committee of Erie; deputy registrar, the Rev. Walter North, L. H. D., of Buffalo, registrar of the Diocese of Western New York; master of ceremonies, the Rev. Benjamin S. Sanderson, rector of St. Mark's Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Henry F. Zwicker and Charles R. Allison.

At the close of his sermon, Bishop Brent turned and addressed Bishop Ward. "I put before you," he said, "an exalted opinion of your new office, because I know that you would not be satisfied with any other. It will be a comfort to you in your new office to know that what you will do is simply what you have always been doing. Long years of pastoral service have set your character. It will never change, except that it will evpand in your new work. Your cup is full. May the Good Shepherd's kindness and mercy follow you always, and may you live in the house of the Lord forever."

The certificate of election was read by the Rev. Albert Broadhurst, Secretary of Diocese of Erie; canonical testimonial, by the Rev. John B. Hubbs, D. D., chaplain of Hobart College; evidence of ordinations, by the Rev. Charles H. Smith, D. D., rector of St. James' Church, Buffalo; the confirmation by the Standing Committees, by Turner W. Shacklett, Treasurer of Diocese of Erie; the canonical testimonial of the bishops, by Rt. Rev. W. H. Overs, Ph. D., Missionary Bishop of Liberia.

Following the services luncheon was served in the parish house, at the conclusion of which Bishop Ward was presented with the Episcopal ring, the gift of the Buffalo clerics, the Ministerial Association of the Archdeaconery of Buffalo. The presentation speech was by the Rev. Dr. Charles H. Smith, president of the Buffalo Clerics.

MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. Chas. D. Williams, D. D., Bishop.

Michigan and the Missionary Centennial.

The Diocese of Michigan and Detroit should play a large part in the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the Foreign Missionary Society of the Church, which is being observed throughout the country during September, October and November.

The first service by an organized religious body held in Detroit was conducted by the Rev. A. W. Welton, of the Episcopal Church in 1821, the first year of existence of the missionary organization. It was held under the auspices of the First Protestant Society. The Rev. Mr. Welton came to Detroit from New York, and after a ministry of about a year died, and was buried in the churchyard, then located near the corner of Jefferson Avenue and Randolph Street, and now one of the prominent districts of the city.

Services of the church were held from time to time at the old Indian Council House on Jefferson Avenue, near Randolph Street. It was at this place the first St. Paul's Parish was subsequently organized in 1824. It was not a building suitable in many respects for Church worship, nor was it ecclesiastical, but it was the cradle of the Episcopal Church in Michigan, and as such it will always be remembered.

St. Paul's was the first of the organized parishes of the Episcopal Church in the Northwest. It has been closely associated with affairs of more than local interest, and it has been the starting point of agencies for Church extension not only in Michigan, but in regions beyond which once belonged to the Diocese.

Plans are under way in most of the churches of the Diocese of Michigan to present the Centennial pageant. Special sermons have already been preached in many places, and the celebration will culminate in special services with appropriate sermons which will be held on November 6 in practically every parish in the Diocese.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Richmond Convocation.

The seventy-fifth convention of the Convocation of Richmond will be held in Christ Church, Richmond, Va. (the Rev. B. N. de Foe Wagner, rector), on Tuesday and Wednesday, October 25 and 26. The Convocation will open with a Quiet Hour on Tuesday, conducted by the Rev. L. B. Franck, of Roxbury, Va., and the last service will be on Wednesday evening, with an address on the Nation-Wide Campaign.

The Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D., celebrated his tenth anniversary as rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, on Sunday, October 9, with a special service of thanksgiving for the good accomplished by the congregation in all branches of Church work during his ministry. In reviewing the work of the parish for the past decade, Dr. Bowie said the membership of the historic church had almost doubled since then, and missionary gifts had increased from $2,000 annually to $30,000, and also spoke of the plans of the church for the future.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

The Rev. Robert C. Jett D. D. Bishop

Work Among Indians.

On Saturday night, October 1, Bishop Jett visited the Indian Mission near Amherst. Two hundred and sixty-seven Indians were in the congregation at this service. The Rev. Thomas D. Lewis, assisted by the Rev. Thomas Howell, presented a confirmation class of eleven persons. The preparation of this class was largely shared by Miss Isabelle Wagner, the missionary in charge of the mission. Miss Jane Boyd Neely, of Portsmouth, Va., on October 1 took up her duties as assistant to Miss Wagner, who is greatly cheered and encouraged in her work by having Miss Neely with her.

Amherst: On Sunday morning, October 2, at Ascension Church, Amherst, the Rev. Thomas D. Lewis presented a class of five for confirmation. Mr. Lewis has here an exceptionally large Bible class for men, and also one for women. The work of the church at Amherst is unusually promising under Mr. Lewis' administration. Sunday afternoon, at a service at St. Mark's Church, Clifford, another point under the charge of Mr. Lewis, a class of three was confirmed. Sunday night the Bishop preached the sermon at a community service, held in Ascension Church, Amherst, this service being attended by members of other denominations, as well as the regular congregation of the church.

The work in the Archdeaconry is making excellent progress under Archdeacon Rich. A portion of this field was recently assigned to the Rev. M. Paul S. Huntington, with residence at Norton, Va. Mr. Huntington is progressing finely with his charge, and is not only gathering an excellent congregation, but is building up a Sunday school of great promise. A reception recently given Mr. Huntington by his people was largely attended by his own parishioners, ministers of other denominations and friends of his congregation.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor.

For the Emery Jubilee Fund.

To the Clergy and the Congregations of Southern Virginia:

My Dear Brethren:

The Church is preparing to commemorate, during the month of October, the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions.

I, who have lived through this half century, can bear witness to the wonderful work which that organization of the consecrated women of the Church has done for the furtherance of Christ's kingdom. The growth in the mission field and the increased interest in the progress of the gospel is largely due to the Auxiliary. God only knows what it has meant to our faithful missionaries to have back of them the sympathy, the prayers and the active support of our women.

I would ask our people to meet in their churches on Sunday, October 30, to give thanks to the Almighty God for the blessed service of the Woman's Auxiliary, to pray for the cause of missions, and to make as an expression of gratitude to God for His blessing on the Church, a liberal contribution to the fund, which has been named in honor of the Misses Emery, to whose many years of faithful service the Board of Missions and the Woman's Auxiliary are largely indebted.

Where it is practicable it would be well to have, in connection with the commemoration the service of the Holy Communion. It would also help if the clergy would set before the people the work and the claims of the Woman's Auxiliary.

Praying for God's blessing upon the commemoration, I am,

Faithfully yours,
Beverly D. Tucker.
Bishop of Southern Virginia.

The Synod of the Fourth Province to Be Held in Savannah.

The Synod of the Fourth Province will meet in Savannah, Ga., October 25 to 27, opening with a service of Evening Prayer at St. John's Church, the evening of the 25th. The speakers will be the Rev. R. Bland Mitchell and the Rev. W. C. Sturges, D. D., from the Mission House; the Bishop of Tennessee and the Rev. Bernard Iddings Bell, of St. Stephen's College; Mr. Richard I. Manning, of South Carolina; the Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, of the Department of Christian Social Service; the Rev. S. B. Strong, of Asheville; the Rev. James M. Maxon, of Tennessee, and the Rt. Rev. H. B. Delaney, of North Carolina.

The Provincial Council of the Church Service League will be in session at the time of the Synod, meeting also in St. John's Parish Hall. As this is the first meeting of the Council, the program has been arranged so that each organization will have its meeting before the combined group of women, reserving only its elections for a meeting which is distinctly of its own delegates. Miss Nannie Hite Winston, of Kentucky, Provincial chairman, will preside over the general meetings, and each Provincial president of the national organizations will preside in turn. Addresses will be given by Miss Grace Lindley, from the Missions House; there will be a conference on the "Position of Women in the Church," and Mrs. W. J. Loaring Clark, of Tennessee, will lead one on "Parish Co-operation and Federation."

On the Sunday previous to the Synod, October 23, four parishes in the Diocese besides Savannah will be visited by bishops, who will preach on Religious Education. The Bishop of Mississippi will be at St. Mark's Church, Brunswick; the Bishop Coadjutor of Mississippi will be at Grace Church, Waycross; the Bishop of East Carolina will be at St. Paul's Church, Augusta, and the Bishop Coadjutor of Tennessee will be at St. Andrew's Church, Darien. In Savannah the pulpits on that Sunday will be filled as follows: Christ Church by the Bishop of Kentucky, St. John's Church by the Vice-Chancellor of the University of the South, St. Paul's Church by the Bishop of Southern Florida, and St. Michael and All Angels' by the Bishop of Florida.

A pre-Synod conference on Religious Education will be held in Savannah Sunday afternoon, October 23, and Monday afternoon and evening. Lectures for the officers, teachers and senior pupils of the Church schools will be given by the Rev. Gardner L. Tucker, Provincial Secretary of Religious Education, Miss Mabel Lee Cooper, and the Rev. W. A. Jonnard, of Tennessee.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

The Churchman's League.

Meetings of the Churchman's League of the Diocese of Washington will be held again this year on Tuesday evenings in the Assembly Hall of the Cosmos Club, according to an announcement made by the President, Dr. Marcus Benjamin. The first meeting will be October 25, when the Bishop of Washington will be the speaker, taking for his subject "Some of the Lessons of the Lambeth Conference."

Memorial Service to Chaplain Pierce.

The people's open-air evensong at the Washington Cathedral on Sunday, October 9, was a memorial service to Chaplain Pierce, U. S. A. The preacher was the Bishop of Washington.

To Raise Standard of Church Music.

The District of Columbia Chapter of the American Guild of Organists is planning a series of free organ recitals during the coming season in Washington by well-known organists from other cities. The object of such a series is to raise the standard of church music and increase music appreciation in the community. The project will be financed by a recital fund to which many Church people have already subscribed.

At the twenty-fifth annual convention of the Sunday School Institute of the Diocese, the principal addresses will be made by the Rev. Samuel S. Drury, of Concord, N. H., and Dr. James E. Freeman, rector of Epiphany Church. Conferences, exhibits and open discussion will consume the larger part of the program.

Five boys, who are members of the Junior Brotherhood of St. Andrew's Church, will be sent to the convention of the Brotherhood in Norfolk by the church.

A new rectory has been purchased by the congregation of the Chapel of the Transfiguration. The Rev. John J. Queally is the rector.

Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan-Elect.

Bishops Confirm Dr. Shipman's Election.

The Rev. Dr. Herbert Shipman, rector of Heavenly Rest Parish, was confirmed in record time by the Bishops for Suffragan Bishop of New York, following affirmative action by a majority of the Standing Committees. Immediately word was received from Bishop Tuttle, concerning action of the Bishops, the Bishop of New York sent congratulations, and during a single day many friends called and others wrote and telephoned. Speaking of the strain, Dr. Shipman observed that when it was all over he realized how he had had no rest this summer worth mentioning. He gave warm words of appreciation of the efforts of his friends, chief of which was the Rev. Dr. Stuart L. Tyson, of Princeton. The Rev. Dr. Tyson stated that he felt sure his last pamphlet addressed to the Bishops had marked effect in the quick response.

It is stated that the Heavenly Rest Parish has made no effort to secure a successor, pending decision about its present rector, but it is also stated that so great is the need for work in the Diocese, which only a Bishop can do, that no delay will now be had in making arrangements for the consecration. That will take place, it is expected, in the Cathedral and not in Heavenly Rest Church, although it is remembered that in the church in question many diocesan events have taken place. The convention that elected Bishop Greer was held there. With the vacancy at Heavenly Rest two of the largest parishes of the Diocese are vacant, the other being St. John's, Yonkers, the mother parish of that city.

Churches Begin Fall Work.

St. Mary's, the Rev. Charles B. Ackley, rector, has converted the Sunday evening service into a Bible class, in which Sunday school lessons for the coming week are taught by the rector. A social time follows, at which efforts are made to bring in strangers and get them acquainted. Men and women are being utilized for parish visiting, not on one occasion a year, but regularly. A group conference has just been held, three sessions, in order to suit the convenience of all. Charts were presented illustrating the entire work of the parish, local and general. Calvary Church, the Rev. Dr. Theodore Sedgwick, is bringing in laymen each Sunday morning, just preceding the sermons, in ten minutes to tell the people about the Nation-Wide Campaign and other features of Church work. Holy Communion, the Rev. Dr. Henry Mottet, is having a careful canvass of its down town district made, the Federation of Churches assisting it. St. Paul's, Poughkeepsie, the Rev. Dr. F. S. Smithers, has just held a conference of parents and their sons, twelve to sixteen, with a view of getting parents and sons better acquainted with each other than they often are. No mention was made of candidates for the ministry, but the conference had that matter as one of the aims. The new rector of St. Mary's, Bronx, the Rev. Frank R. Jones, long with the City Mission Society, has begun work with a canvass of the community, a highly congested one.

Mass Meeting Planned by Church Club.

The Church Club plans a mass meeting in Carnegie Hall on Friday evening, November 18, at which Bishop Manning will preside and give the principal address. He will present the work of the Diocese and its needs. The club has appointed a committee from among its own members in and for each parish. Singing will be an important part of the program.

Virginia Seminary Opens With The Largest Number of Students in Its History

The Virginia Theological Seminary, Alexandria, opened on September 21. The opening sermon was preached on September 25 to the Seminary and to the Episcopal High School by the Rev. Arthur B. Kinsolving, D. D., an alumnus of both institutions. The new students matriculated at the first faculty meeting on September 29, when the student body was addressed by Dean Green on the subject of "Loyalty." Thirty-three new students have been enrolled and twenty seven old students have returned, making a total enrollment of sixty. This is the largest entering class and also the largest number of students which the Seminary has ever had in the ninety-nine years of its history. These sixty students come from twenty-four dioceses and represent almost every section of our country and Church. Twenty-six colleges and universities are represented in the present student body. This college roll is not only interesting, but it is a most encouraging sign for the future of the ministry. It includes Oxford, Cambridge; Trinity College, Toronto; Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Princeton, Trinity College, Hartford; Cornell, Lehigh, St. Stephen's, Pennsylvania State, University of Virginia, William and Mary, Washington and Lee, Randolph-Macon, University of North Carolina, North Carolina State College, Charleston College, University of Texas, Southern Methodist University, Gallaudet College, Kenyon, Ursinus, St. John's, Maryland, and University of North Dakota. Almost all of the students have had considerable college training, and twenty-four of them hold academic degrees, chiefly from the leading colleges of America. The average academic training is probably higher than it ever has been.

Another very encouraging fact is that a large number of older men are to be found among the new students. The average age among them is, in fact, twenty-eight. A number of these men are coming into the ministry from business or professional life, and a number were in war service. They will thus bring to the ministry a wide and varied lay experience—always a most valuable asset. One or two of these older men certainly, and possibly others, have come into the ministry as a result of their lay work in the Nation-Wide Campaign.

The Seminary has recently made a number of material improvements. A large number of the alumni were present at the opening of the beautiful Packard-Laird Memorial Library last June. The library is now in use and is already proving most helpful. The dormitories have all been repaired and repainted and modern shower baths put into each of them.

The handsome gift to the Education Society last June by a generous friend in a neighboring State is enabling the Seminary to care for the great increase in students in a way that would otherwise have been impossible.

The Virginia Seminary is thus facing the future with renewed hope and courage, under the wisely conservative yet progressive leadership of its popular, trusted and beloved dean, "whose praise is in all the churches," and who is supported by a loyal and united faculty. The Seminary is endeavoring to be faithful to its high traditions and glorious heritage. It is striving, as it has always done, to put in the first place vital, personal religion and the true Christian missionary spirit. It is also striving to improve its scholarship and to adapt its curriculum to the needs of this new time. And with such a policy supported by a splendid Board of Trustees and by a large body of loyal alumni, the Seminary hopes to increase its service to the whole Church.

Collect for St. Luke's Day.

Almighty God, who calledst Luke the Physician, whose praise is in the Gospel, to be an Evangelist and Physician of the soul; may it please Thee that, by the wholesome medicines of the doctrine delivered by him, all the diseases of our souls may be healed; through the merits of Thy Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Christ With Us.

"Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these, ye did it unto Me."

I cried aloud, "There is no Christ
In all this world unparadised!
No Christ to go to in my need—
No Christ to comfort me and feed!
He passed in glory out of sight,
The angels drew Him into light:
Now in the lonesome earth and air
I cannot find Him anywhere.
Would God that heaven were not so far
And I were where the white ones are!

Then from the gray stones of a street,
Where goes an ocean drift of feet,
I heard a child's cry tremble up,
And turned to share my scanty cup.
When lo, the Christ I thought was dead
Was in the little one I fed!
At this I drew my aching eyes
From the far-watching of the skies;

And now which ever way I turn
I see my Lord's white halo burn!
Wherever now a sorrow stands,
'Tis mine to heal His nail-torn hands;
In every lonely lane and street,
'Tis mine to wash His wounded feet—
'Tis mine to roll away the stone
And warm His heart against my own.

Here, here, on earth I find it all—
The young archangels white and tall,
The golden city and the doors,
And all the shining of the floors!

Detour.

PART II.

Mr. Fitch helped his wife wash the dishes and put the kitchen to rights as the young folks joyfully deserted the porch to explore the premises. "It isn't so much the work as the lack of conveniences," she said almost tearfully. "You see the things we used tonight were all made by Aunt Hannah, who never has much company, and when they are gone I'll have to keep things on hand for emergencies. I know dozens of families who are situated as we are, and there is no way out of it all. We own our home and do not want to leave it, but the increased cost of living and trying to maintain old standards is weighing families down. We cannot explain to our friends that we are too poor to entertain them, but that is really the case. The time is coming when we will have to replenish the house with bedding and linens and dishes and utensils, to say nothing of clothes and shoes, so the problem becomes more acute every day."

"Indeed it does," agreed her husband. "I had hoped that the little income from the cows and the chickens out here would help some, but the cream jar is empty and we ate up nearly all the food Aunt Hannah left us. I fear we will realize that it is quite as expensive to live here as in town, except for the rent of our house."

The agent had not been able to find a satisfactory auto for the modest price Mr. Fitch could pay, so old Dobbin had been carrying the four Fitch town residents back and forth a week. Mr. Fitch, Bob and Marjorie went to their respective tasks daily, while Ned had to attend high school five days in the week. It was slow jogging along in the old surrey behind the fat family horse, but there was no other way out of it.

"Now what do you think they've done?" cried three voices in unison as the surrey drove into the farm yard two hours late one beautiful evening.

"I'm sure I don't know, but the supper is dried up and I've been worried greatly about you," said Mrs. Fitch.

"A traction engine broke through the bridge over Eagle Creek, and now they've decided to put in a new bridge instead of repairing the old one. That means that we'll have to go five miles out of our way and detour through a cow pasture and over the worst mud road in this section, the folks told us," explained Mr. Fitch. "No use looking for an auto till that's done."

"And we'll have to start at six in the morning with this old plug to get there in time," said Bob gloomily.

"And it means that supper will be late every evening, mother," said Marjorie. "Let's go back to town."

"We can't," said Mrs. Fitch faintly. "The house is rented till September at least, and we've given our word to Aunt Hannah."

"As soon as the weather gets settled I'm going to walk to town," announced Ned. "I can walk three miles faster than Dobbin can go eight."

"How will you get across Eagle Creek when there's no bridge, wade or swim?" asked his brother.

Ned wilted, but presently he consoled himself that school would be out in June, so he need not endure the agony of riding behind the ancient horse long. "The worst of it all is that none of the kids will be able to get out here till that bridge is repaired," he said discontentedly. "They all have machines, and no machine could get over the road we traveled this evening.

"Well, we'll have to make the best of it," said Mrs. Fitch cheerily. Her son's words had aroused hope in her breast. "Come on in and eat what is not dried up, and tomorrow I'll have the meal later."

Next morning a gloomy party started off in the surrey. It was two hours before the usual time, because the unfamiliar road and many bad places in it made it necessary to allow for such difficulties. "I hate to leave you alone here all day, mother," said Marjorie. "It will be such a long, long day."

"Don't worry about me," said Mrs. Fitch cheerily. "I need a rest after my strenuous winter."

By mid-summer there was little time for grumbling, but the gloom had deepened in the hearts of the Fitch young people. They rose earlier than they ever rose before in their lives to help with the garden, the bees, the cows and the chickens so that Mrs. Fitch might not be overburdened, but they felt sure that they would never consent to go to the country again as long as they lived. They reluctantly attended services in the little country church, and even entered into the few country good times half-heartedly. Mrs. Fitch was enthusiastic in thinking the neighbors lovely people, and Ned had a good time fishing and swimming with boys of his age when he could get away from his many chores, but for the most part the summer was not a success, according to the young folks. There was always something to prepare to carry to town to sell, or to get ready for the huckster from a neighboring town, who made the rounds of the neighborhood twice a week, or something to do in the garden, and day after day there was the tedious drive behind shambling Dobbin over the round-about way necessitated by the building of the new bridge.

"I got a raise!" announced Bob briefly one September evening. "Greatest surprise in the world."

"And I have the offer of a better place," said Marjorie proudly. "Mr. Delavin stopped me today on the street and asked me if I'd consider a place in his office at twenty dollars more a month than I've been getting at the bank. I was surprised like Bob, and yet since I think it over there have been signs of something coming. Mr. Delavin is a stockholder in the bank and he's been watching me pretty closely all summer. They've given me extra things to do, and I thought it was hardly fair, but they say I'm so much more careful than some of the others that they like me to do the responsible things. At first I was foolish enough to be rather resentful, but now I know it is a compliment to be asked to do the big things."

"I can tell you both why you are succeeding," said Mrs. Fitch. "It's this summer on the farm that's doing it."

"Why, mother, this summer has been the greatest handicap of my life," said Bob promptly. "I never felt so out of things since I was in France, as I have out here in this wilderness."

"That's exactly what the summer has been to me—a handicap," said Marjorie. "Mother, dear, if it hadn't been for the thought of you toiling out here alone I'd have deserted long ago and boarded in town."

"Nevertheless, your mother is right," said Mr. Fitch quietly. "And we both know that it is the detour that has accomplished such wonders in our lives. I feel better fit for work today than I have for years past, and we are getting on our feet financially. Dr. Jacobs told me only last week that your mother would have been in a sanitarium if we had not come here. The excessive hospitality and attempts of the modern woman to keep pace with the ideas of ten years ago, he says, are filling insane hospitals and rest cures with patients. I can never be thankful enough to Aunt Hannah for the offer of her farm this summer."

"And when we go back to town it will not be to our home on Elm Street," added Mrs. Fitch. "Housekeeping and home-making are for the purpose of making the members of the family successful and healthy and happy, and I've found this quiet summer that one can go at a slower pace—detour from the high road, if you please—and still arrive at the desired end. We will take a smaller house where living is cheaper, and give up forever the struggle to maintain the standards of other days."

"Well, I've noticed, mother," said Bob thoughtfully, "that many of the fellows are cool to me since they get nothing out of being friendly, as the saying goes. Of course many of them are just as nice as ever, but there is a noticeable falling off among many who used to come to our house."

"All these wonderful things have gone to my brain," said Marjorie. "I'm so sorry I've been disagreeable and selfish when I might have enjoyed the whole summer. O yes, I forgot to tell you; I had a card from Cousin Lottie, saying that Aunt Hannah would not be home until October. Let's have a real vacation until that time and make up for all that is past. Father and mother have no need of repentance, but the rest of us have."

"When I show you my bank account from the sale of produce, you'll see why I have enjoyed the summer," said Mrs. Fitch. "Every bill is settled and we have adjusted ourselves to the changed conditions to our profit, all because that engine crashed through the old bridge and made a detour necessary."

"I shouldn't wonder if many other people have found in the round-about path of life, when the apparently straight road was closed to their feet, the happiness and success they never dreamed was waiting for them by the rough trail just as we have had a profitable summer wasting our time, as we thought, jogging along behind old Dobbin," said Mr. Fitch. "I do hope that bridge will not be in before we leave the farm. I want the time spent on the long trail to think out some more of life's problems."

"If they do finish it, I move that we stick to the rough road through the woods," said Marjorie. "It is a great pity I didn't see the beauty and profit of the winding path through pasture and woods before this, but I want at least a month to do some thinking myself before we go back to town."

"Second the motion!" said Bob rather huskily. "I've got some thinking to do myself, and that detour will help me settle the difference between true hospitality and overworking the best mother in the world for all time, I hope. And now I'm going right out to give Dobbin some extra oats and all the sugar mother will spare to make up for the mean things I've said about him, while he's been helping me climb the ladder of success without knowing that he was doing it."—Hilda Richmond, in Presbyterian Banner.

Love of Service.

The disturbances in the Near East have heightened rather than checked the desire for service on the part of American men and women. During the first four months of the year there were four hundred and eleven applications made by letter or interview at the national headquarters. Of the total number applying, one-third of them filled out formal blanks.

The reason for this percentage is not lack of enthusiasm on the part of the applicants, but the strictness of the requirements now being made for overseas workers. Only specialized personnel are being taken on, and no others are encouraged to fill out the forms. This policy of engaging only experienced nurses or teachers or transportation experts is in keeping with the general plan of the organization to conduct their administration on the most efficient and economical lines. It is very heartening to find that the office is flooded with applications from men and women who have attained more than ordinary success in their professions, and who are volunteering their services at an only nominal salary.

Of these four hundred applicants only two were appointed during the four months covering the time in which the statistics were made out. Ten others were sent over, but they had all had their applications in for some time.

Of the last three workers to be sent out, on August 4, one was an expert accountant who had done special work with the Red Cross in Poland, Russia and the Ukraine, one was a transportation man, who had directed that service for the Red Cross in France, and one was a surgeon.—The New Near-East.

Life.

John E. Shea.

A stone of huge, unshapely form,
Left in the desert, how or when,
No chronicle of time might tell;
Came man—placed tent beside that stone:
With chisel, hammer wrought he well,
Out of the bulk, much chipped away,
Emerged an image, human-like.

Time passed, and to that place came change.
A skull was there, and many bones
Lay scattered on the earth around,
Where beasts had mauled them for their food.
The man of stone still upright stood.
"Can these bones live again?" was asked,
"Or life to this stone creature come—
Since it survives the wrecks of time?"
And heard there was a Voice, which said,
"He that once lived, though dead, shall live."

Music's Catholicity.

Music has an indispensable value in the religion of today, because it is catholic in character. It appeals to all men; it crosses boundaries and fences as if they were not there; it unites and draws together souls of all types.

In the music of the Church, the Church is most catholic. Too often our creeds divide us into hostile groups; our forms and institutions become fences to keep us apart; even the sacrament of communion, sacred memorial of the Christ we all adore, shuts us one from another. It is when we sing that we are all one. A Protestant congregation might be shocked if its minister brought a Roman Catholic priest into the pulpits to participate in the worship. But it sings with joy Faber's hymn, "There's a Wideness in God's Mercy," forgetting that the writer was a Roman Catholic. Congregations which might protest were a Unitarian minister given part in the service find only heart-satisfaction as they sing Oliver Wendell Holmes' great Sunday hymn (as he called it), "Lord of All Being, Throned Afar."

Even more marked and wonderful than the wide appeal of hymns is the catholicity of music itself. It is a great universal language, needing no translation. Tolstoy writes a great tract, and it is sealed to all save those who know the particular language in which he writes. But Tschaikowsky writes a symphony, and it goes at once to men of every tongue and type with its immortal message of beauty. Christians in Africa and Asia sing words utterly unintelligible to us; but we hear the tune, and our hearts join with them in the emotions and experiences awakened b "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," or "Rock of Ages, Cleft for Me."

Surely the music of the Church has a mighty, a unique, value in the religious life of this day, through this wonderful catholicity which characterizes it. The world, so deeply in need of God, the race of man, bowed down beneath a load of misery and pain and hatred which only the grace of God can lift; the social life of this nation, marred by class-spirit and race prejudice, and industrial cleavages, call for a Church heartily one, a Church that shall count unity, catholicity, brotherhood, the greatest of essentials; a Church that shall be content with the test Christ Himself applied, "Hereby shall all men know that ye are My disciples, if ye love one another." The religious crime of the day is the divisive spirit, the disunion of religious forces. To exalt the music of the Church, to give it high place and make it worthy, will set in motion a powerful tendency to catholicity.—Rev. W. P. Merrill.

Abiding Places.

The child asks you when you give him anything, "Can I have it to keep?" It is the immortal spirit within him that speaks. Our Lord satisfies this immortal craving in man, and speaks of abiding places in the heavens—not tents which you no sooner erect than you pull down again, and give back to the waste that spot which for a brief night you have associated with your hearth and home, but abiding places from which we shall "go no more out forever." Some time ago I revisited the village in which I was born. I looked for the chapel-house where as a child I spent many happy days. To my surprise, it was no longer there, but another house had been built on the same site. Then I turned to the garden where I had often played, but the greater part of it had been added to the adjoining graveyard. "Ah!" I thought, "there is no abiding home on earth, and every garden, sooner or later, has graves dug in it; but in my Father's house are many abiding places."—Selected.

He Alone Is Great.

I like the man who faces what he must
With step triumphant and a heart of cheer;
Who fights the daily battle without fear;
Sees his hopes fall, yet keeps unfaltering trust
That God is God; that somehow, true and just,
His plans work out for mortals; not a tear
Is shed when fortune, which the world holds dear,
Falls from his grasp; better, with love, a crust.
Than living in dishonor; envies not,
Nor loses faith in man; but does his best,
Nor even murmurs at his humbler lot,
But with a smile and words of hope gives zest
To every toiler; he alone is great,
Who by a life heroic conquers fate.

—Sarah K. Bolton.

The doctrine of the class war, and the weapon of the general strike sound a new note of menace to the progress of mankind. They destroy the sense that a people is one moral and spiritual whole bound together by spiritual ties.—Lord Bryce's "Democracy."

For the Young Folks

Some Place for You.

There is some place for you to fill,
Some work for you to do,
That no one can, or ever will,
Do quite as well as you.
It may close along your way,
Some little, homely duty,
That only waits your touch, your sway,
To blossom into beauty.

Or it may be that daily tasks,
Cheerfully seen and done,
Will lead to greater work that asks
For you, and you alone.
Be brave, whatever it may be,
The little or the great,
To meet, and do it perfectly,
And you have conquered fate.

Billy Boy Meets Fluffy Tail.

Ethel D. Nelson.

Fluffy Tail was lonely and Billy Boy was lonely too. Fluffy Tail was a squirrel who lived in the park on the north side of the street, while Billy Boy had just moved into the big house on the south side of the same street, and the only friend he had made was the ash-man, who came but once a week, which did not help out very much. He was still very lonely.

So Fluffy Tail sat on the north side of the street and sighed for some one to play with, while Billy Boy sat on the south side of the street and sighed for the very same thing.

Billy Boy was so very busy sighing that he did not see Fluffy Tail, and Fluffy Tail was so busy sighing that he did not see the lonely little boy across the street.

Billy Boy sat under a great maple tree digging in a pile of dry leaves with a stick when suddenly from the hole which he had been digging came the queerest looking little man. He was no higher than Billy Boy's knee, and he wore a red hat that came to a point and had a long red tassel at the very top. His brown clothes fitted him closely, and his shoes were red with long points just like the hat, only they had no tassel at the ends.

"What is the matter, Billy Boy?" he asked.

"I am lonesome," answered Billy Boy, feeling so sorry for himself that he forgot to be surprised at the appearance of the funny little man.

The little man took off the tall hat he wore and wiped off the two big tears that had started to roll down Billy Boy's fat little cheeks.

"Smile, Billy Boy, smile; you will never find friends by sighing," he said, and with that he ran back in the hole Billy had dug and disappeared.

At least he disappeared so far as Billy was concerned, but really he went across the street and popped up right in front of the squirrel.

"Fluffy Tail," he asked, "what is the matter with you?"

"I am lonesome," answered the little squirrel, just as Billy Boy had, only the tears did not roll down his cheeks because he knew nothing about crying.

"Then smile, Fluffy Tail, smile; you will never find friends by sighing," said the little man as he disappeared again. But this time neither the boy nor the squirrel could find him.

Fluffy Tail sat up and looked all around, but the funny little fellow was gone, and all that he saw was a boy across the street.

Billy Boy, too, looked all around, but all that he saw was a squirrel on the other side of the street. And when the boy saw the squirrel and the squirrel saw the boy, and each saw how funny the other looked, they began to laugh, and it was just as the little man had said, "Friendship begins with smiles"; and never again were they lonely.

Billy Boy always kept a few nuts in his pocket for Fluffy Tail, and Fluffy Tail always watched for Billy Boy, and from that day on they played together and were the very best of friends.

Auntie in School.

"Now, where have you been?" asked Auntie Grace as Tedkins came up on her back porch one fine afternoon.

"Why, to school, of course, Auntie Grace. Where have you been?" replied Tedkins.

"Oh, I've been to school, too," laughed Auntie Grace.

"I didn't see you. Were you in my room?"

"Oh, no. It was a school here in the back yard."

"A school here in the back yard? Why, Auntie Grace, what do you mean?"

"It was a robin's school. I didn't go to it, of course; I was just a visitor—watching it from the back window, where I was ironing. Two robins—I suppose they were the Papa and Mamma Robin—were trying to teach a young robin to fly. I just wish you could have watched them, Tedkins. The young robin was sitting on the ground under the cherry tree, and they seemed to be trying to get it to fry to a certain place on a lower branch of the tree. First one of them would come down by the little robin and stand there a few minutes close beside it; then the old robin would flutter its wings and fly up to the place on the branch just above where the two parent robins would sit for a little while to see if the young one was going to fly up to them. It would flutter its wings and run along on the ground a few steps, but it seemed to be afraid to try to lift itself up into the air.

Then the other old robin would go down beside the little one and flutter its wings and try to get the little one to fly up in the tree. They both tried and tried for a long time, and still the little fellow couldn't seem to learn just how he ought to manage his wings to fly. Pretty soon he began to get hungry and began opening his mouth and crying for something to eat. Then what do you suppose that wise old papa bird did?"

"I don't know," said Tedkins; "tell me."

"He flew away and was gone quite awhile. When he came back he had a big angle worm in his mouth. He flew down close beside the young robin, and the little fellow snapped at the worm, but he didn't get it! For just as he was trying to get hold of it the father bird fluttered his wings and started to fly very slowly up towards the place in the cherry tree where the other bird was. The little bird fluttered its wings and kept reaching up for the worm, and just in a few minutes he was flying right up into the air after his father and that worm. Now, wasn't that an interesting school lesson? I expect to learn lots of things about those robins this summer watching them in our cherry tree."—L. C. Farmer, in Presbyterian Banner.

Flint and Steel.

Philip B. Duncan, Age 11.

A band of Indian warriors rode swiftly over the prairie. By their dress they were plainly Apaches. They had been riding all day and were very weary. The thick dust lifted by the hot burning winds made their throats dry and parched. One Indian, apparently the leader, rode in advance of the band, and often he would slow his pony into a walk, and lifting his hand to shade his eyes, would scan the country closely for a few minutes and as the others rode up would grunt out his command and they would start on their way again.

Through the long, hot day they rode without stopping, although both men and beasts were almost famished for water. Their camp the night before had been made in a barren spot and they had used most of the water which they carried with them. They were on the edge of the Sioux territory and the rest of their journey must be made with great caution.

They did not dare venture near the springs. The little band would not last long did the Sioux scent their approach. Once they reached the Council of Nations they would be safe, at least until they started home again. And with a few days' rest for both the Indians and their ponies, and a new supply of food and water, they could reach the border of their own territory in safety.

Just then it would have been fatal to hunt for game or water, for the springs would be watched and the noise from their guns would be heard in an instant. They dared not take the chance as long as daylight lasted.

The Apaches had been selected to represent the tribe at the Council, and their own comforts came last.

Late that night they camped on a small gulch. There, as luck would have it, they found water to quench their thirst, and as they rested they ate the last of the food. The ponies, after their thirst had been quenched, sank to the ground, glad of a chance to rest. The Indians, too, were soon fast asleep.

A few minutes later a huge Sioux warrior rose from the tall prairie grass and stole quietly away. Later the Apache leader rose and gazed long in the direction which the Sioux had taken. Then he, too, laid down and was soon sleeping.

At the first ray of light he was up again. Calling the band, he got his pony and started out. The others rode silently after him. They had hardly taken six steps when a bullet cut a lock of hair from the chief's head. The whole band immediately fell to the ground and were hidden by the tall grass. The ponies were forced back down into the gulch and the Indians circled around the edge of the grass until they knew that they were on the windward side. Waiting until the ponies were well out of the way, then taking from his pocket several pieces of flint and steel, the leader ordered the grass to be lighted in a dozen places at once.

The grass was dry and blazed up instantly. The Sioux were taken by surprise, for they had expected the Apaches to attempt to escape, as their number was so small. They were very much puzzled at first. But later, as the grass blazed up fiercely, they saw that it was useless to attempt to pass through the burning mass or to reach the path that led down into the gulch.

The Apaches waited long enough to see that the fire was well under way, and running for their ponies, they leaped to the saddles and rode safely away.

Flint and Steel had done its work.

Where?

Where can a man buy a cap for his knee?
Or a key for a lock of his hair?
Can his eyes be called an academy
Because there are pupils there?
In the crown of his head what gems are set?
Who crosses the bridge of his nose?
Can he use when shingling the roof of his mouth
The nails on the ends of his toes?

Teamwork Among Squirrels.

A party of young people tenting in a grove near a glen in New England witnessed an incident which seems to show a friendly understanding among squirrels.

An out-of-door dinner had just been finished and the members of the party were still sitting at the table, when a red squirrel, with glistening, eager eyes, came creeping down a tree which stood near the table. It crept nearer and nearer, and finally leaped upon the table.

The young girl who was presiding said, "Yes, help yourself to anything you want!"

Upon this invitation the little squirrel made bold to creep up to a loaf of bread from which only a slice or two had been cut. It seized the loaf, dragged it to the side of the table, and somehow managed to scramble down to the ground. The squirrel then fixed its teeth in the crust and dragged the bread away, and down the steep sides of the glen.

When it reached the bottom and confronted the steep rise on the other side of the glen it was too much for the squirrel to undertake, so it gave a sort of call. This seemed to be understood, for soon other squirrels were seen coming from several directions. They crowded about their friend and, after a little conference, all took hold, and with tug and strain they managed to bring the loaf to the top of the hill, and disappeared with it into the woods beyond.—Presbyterian Banner.

My Dog.

Charlotte Lee, age 8 years.

Once I had a little dog
Who was brown and gray;
He followed me 'most everywhere
Whene'er I went away.

I called my little doggie,
Who was brown and gray,
My darling little collie pup
Who never ran away.

The Curiosity of a Little Boy.

Little things and little people are often responsible for great results, and maybe you do not know that the discovery of that important instrument, the telescope, may be traced to the curiosity of a little boy.

The little boy I am telling you about was the son of an optician who lived in Holland. He and his sisters loved to play about their father's work-bench, and often they amused themselves by looking at the sea through the concave glasses which father used in his work.

Now, one day it happened that the boy, while playing with two of those glasses, chanced to hold them before his eyes in such a way that the face of the cathedral clock seemed very near.

This surprised him greatly, for the clock was so far away that he could scarcely see the hands with his naked eyes.

For awhile he stared at the clock, and then at the glasses, each of which he tried in turn, but the clock was as far away as ever, and so it remained, turn them as he would, until by chance he turned them both up together, when, lo! as if by magic the church stood beside him.

"Oh, I know, I know!" he cried aloud, "it's the two together." Then in great joy he ran to his father and told him of his remarkable discovery.

The father tried the glesses in his turn and found that the boy had spoken the truth, when he said he could bring the great church clock nearer.

So this was the way people learned that putting a concave and a convex glass together in just the right position would make distant objects seem near. Without this knowledge we should never have had the telescope, and without the telescope we should have known little of the sun, moon or stars.

So, if you ever have a chance to look through a telescope, and see the wonders it has to reveal, just remember the little boy who once lived in far-off Holland.—Ex.

A Waggy Tail.

The little dog with the waggy tail
Knew there was fun in the air;
Signs he noticed that would not fail
And good smells everywhere.
He barked to himself the whole day through:
"Will they take me, too? Will they take me, too?"

He ran so much, and he wagged so hard,
And he stood on his hind legs so,
That he nearly wore a path in the yard
Before it was time to go.
I like the end of the tale, don't you?
They took him, too—yes, they took him, too!

Boats That Fly.

William and his friend, Edward, both seven years old, sat on tne edge of the long pier, looking out upon the water of the wide river. Boats here and there were to be seen, some drifting slowly downstream with the current and others cutting their way through white spray as they steamed against the strong current.

"I like to watch the boats," said William. "Don't you wish we were on that big white one? I wonder where it is going."

"It must be going to New Orleans, or to Memphis. Anyway, I wish we were on it," said Edward.

Just then a crow flew with flapping black wings across the river, cawing loudly as it sped. Both boys looked up at it wonderingly. The sky, patched all over with blue, was seen between big white clouds.

"I wish I could fly like that crow," said Edward wistfully as his eyes followed the bird in its flight across the wide river. It became but a tiny speck far in the distance.

Just then a strange humming sound, much like the noise made by their grandfather's sawmill, could be heard.

"What's that noise?" asked William. Both he and Edward looked around. Then they looked up the river and down the river and across the river, but they saw nothing unusual. Still the humming sound seemed to grow louder, and finally it seemed to come from up in the sky. The little boys looked upward, very puzzled. Just then, from behind a big white cloud, came what seemed the largest and most remarkable bird they had ever seen.

"Look! Look!" exclaimed Edward, pointing at the curious object.

"What can it be?" asked William.

"That's a hydroplane," said a voice behind them. Both boys were startled and quickly turned around. There stood Uncle John, smiling and looking straight at them. "Don't you know what a hydroplane is?" he asked.

"Tell us what it is, Uncle John," said Edward. "It looks like a strange bird, and my—what a loud noise it makes!" he exclaimed.

"A hy-dro-plane is a flying boat. Just look at it!" he said. Both boys stood up beside their uncle and were astonished to see the curious object come circling down from the clouds. Nearer and nearer it came until at last it was so close they could see the heads of people above the top rim of the boat. Then it came down very close to the water and both boys thought that it was going to run a while in the river instead of in the air.

But they were mistaken that time. The great flying boat just skimmed the surface of the river, and with a noisy roar went back up into the air.

"The pilot thinks he had better go farther up the river before he lands," said Uncle John, watching with as much interest as the boys themselves.

He was right. The strange flying boat "zoomed" up into the sky and flew right over their heads. Then again it went almost out of sight, far up the river. In a few minutes the boys heard it coming closer. Its humming sound became louder, and before they realized what was going to happen in came right down into the water, making a great splash. Then its noise stopped and it sped along the water faster than any boat they had ever seen. In a few minutes it swung around and came directly over to the bank where the two boys and Uncle John stood.

"Good morning," pleasantly said the pilot. William and Edward saw there were several people in the flying boat. "Can you tell us if there is a house nearby where we can get some lunch? We are on the way to New Orleans and would like to stop here for a few minutes." What do you think Uncle John said? He told the pilot and the passengers to come home with him and the boys and have lunch with them. The boys were delighted, for they heard many strange stories told by their guests.—Child's Gem.

Poor Jane.

"Have you heard of Jane Alden's latest calamity?" Kate Cleland asked.

"What on earth has happened to her now?" Irene Walton responded.

Kate laughed. "You run true to type. Isn't it absurd, the sense of personal grievance we all have when somebody's life knocks some of our pleasant little theories to smash? You feel as if it were their fault and—"

"I know," Irene acknowledged. "I plead guilty. But what has happened?"

"Nothing fatal. Don't look so alarmed. She'll soon be turning it inside out and making an adventure of it. She fell during that icy spell and hurt her knee. She's got to be in a cast for six weeks and then on "crutches."

"Kate! And with those three babies!"

"I know. It just makes me angry. She's been so plucky, but she no sooner gets her head up from one knock-down blow than fate deals her another."

"And you're going to see her tomorrow. I know you! And I'm going with you."

"Wrong; I'm going this afternoon."

That afternoon Kate's little runabout stopped in front of the small house on Daytone Street. A card on the door invited them to walk in without knocking.

"Stop right where you are till I guess my three guesses!" a gay voice called.

"I refuse to encourage such childishness in a woman who should have arrived at years of discretion," Irene replied sternly.

Jane gave an eager cry of welcome. "Oh, you dears! Maidie, go and take their wraps. Oh, isn't this just glorious! I'm being completely spoiled. I've done nothing but live in a round of surprise parties ever since I discovered that smooth place on the Lawtons' sidewalk."

"But, Jane, how do you get along? And with the baby, too!"

Jane's eyes shone. "Isn't it just heavenly? Six whole weeks with my baby—think of it! I was so hungry for him!"

"But meals and everything!" Irene protested.

"Meals? Oh, I can stand, you know. And Dan's a jewel about putting up with simple things. As for the rest of the work—would you believe it?—the neighbors insisted upon dividing it up—washing, ironing and sweeping. Did anybody ever have such wonderful neighbors?"

"The law of neighborliness is a pretty well-established one—cause and effect," Kate remarked.

"Nonsense—it's no such thing! It's sheer kindness," Jane retorted.

It was the gayest of afternoons. They made tea and had a wonderful party. But as they went home Kate sighed angrily, "Poor Jane! It's a shame, all the same."

And this time Irene corrected her. "I think it's the rest of us that are the poor ones—never Jane."—Selected.

Life passes, riches fly away, popularity is fickle, the senses decay, the world changes, friends die. One alone is constant; One alone is true to us; One alone can be true; One alone can be all things to us; One alone can supply our needs; One alone can give a meaning to our complex and intricate nature; One alone can give us tune and harmony; One alone can form and possess us. PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Laying of Cornerstones for Two New Churches.

On Sunday, October 9, Bishop Rhinelander laid the cornerstones of two new churches, both of which have notable histories, one reaching back a hundred years and the other nearly ninety years.

The ceremonies at which the Bishop officiated were at Zion Church, Broad Street and Wyoming Avenue, Logan, and at Emmanuel Church, Marlborough Street and Girard Avenue, Kensington. The Rev. Charles H. Long is rector of Zion Parish, and Rev. Alfred O. Tarrant, Ph. D., M. D., is rector of Emmanuel Parish Both ceremonies were attended by a large number of the clergy and laity of the Diocese.

Zion Church, Logan, is the outcome of the amalgamation of Old Trinity Church, Southwark, and Old Zion Church, at Eighth Street and Columbia Avenue. Changing neighborhood conditions made it necessary to find new locations for both.

After many years the old Emmanuel Church building of brick and stucco became unsafe, and it was recently demolished to make room for the new building now under construction.

The Rev. Dr. Carl E. Grammer, rector of St. Stephen's Church, has returned and taken up his work after a long rest in France, where he had gone on account of throat trouble. Dr. Grammer has entirely recovered his health and from the throat trouble which threatened the loss of his voice.

The Rev. James C. Crosson, rector of Trinity Church, Collingdale, Pa., has resigned to accept a call to the rectorship of the Church of St. Jude and the Nativity, Philadelphia, and will enter upon his new duties October 30. His address after that date will be the Church of St. Jude and the Nativity Parish House, Eleventh and Mt. Vernon Streets, Philadelphia. Mr. Crosson succeeds the Rev. Dr. Caley, who resigned last spring to become rector of St. Martin's Church, Oak Lane.

Chaplain Dickens Leaves for New Post A loving cup and a watch were presented October 6 to Captain C. H. Dickens, chaplain of the Philadelphia navy-yard.

Chaplain Dickens has been assigned to duty as fleet chaplain of the Pacific fleet. For six years he has served at the navy-yard. A large number of persons associated with Captain Dickens in war work attended the presentation exercises at the Navy and Marine Corps Recreation Center in the navy-pard. Several farewell addresses were made.

Farewells were extended to the Rev. and Mrs. Phillip E. Osgood Thursday evening, September 29, by the members of the Chapel of the Mediator, West Philadelphia. Mr. Osgood conducted his last service in the chapel Sunday, October 2, and on Monday he was guest of honor at a luncheon at the City Club. He left for Minneapolis Monday night, and will be rector of St. Mark's Church in that city. Mr. Osgood has been six years in the parish of the Holy Apostles.

The Rt. Rev. Charles B. Colmore, D. D., Missionary Bishop of Porto Rico, was a recent visitor in Philadelphia, and on Sunday, October 9, he addressed a conference on Foreign Missions in St. Mark's Church, the Rev. Dr. Frank L. Vernon, rector.

The Rev. Samuel B. Booth, the "farmer-parson" in charge of the Bucks County Missions, conducted the annual retreat of the Prayer Guild for the teaching office of the church Saturday, October 8, in the Pro-Cathedral. It began with a celebration of the Holy Communion at 8 A. M., and concluded with Evening Prayer at 4 P. M.

The Rev. Robert B. W. Hutt, instructor in psychology at the University of Pennsylvania, has been appointed associate rector of All Saints' Church, Wynnewood. The Rev. Gibson Bell is the rector of All Saints' and also headmaster of the Montgomery school.

Fall Conference Well Attended. $50,000 Gift.

Due to the increased activities and new opportunities in the Diocese, the Bishop Coadjutor felt constrained to convene a fall conference. The sessions of the conference were held in the Parish House, Christ Church, Houston, and at the beautiful Allen Home, Sylvan Beach, LaPorte, September 27 and 28, and were well attended. Free entertainment was provided for all who attended.

After expressing his joy at finding such a representative gathering, the Bishop directed the Rev. Mr. Witsell, rector of St. Paul's, Waco, and diocesan chairman of N.-W. C., to conduct the conference on this subject. Rev. Mr. Claybrook, rector Christ Church, Tyler, and former N.-W. C. chairman, remainded the conference that the N.-W. C. had always been successful, financially and spiritually, wherever it was launched and carried out according to plans outlined by the general committee in charge. Detailed accounts were given as to what the N.-W. C. had done and was doing in the world, United States and Texas. Hearty and long applause was given when it was made known that Texas had gone "over the top" in paying its minimum quota of $52,000, and that a considerable sum would be added to this before the close of the year.

The chairman outlined the educational plans for this fall. Sectional conferences are to be conducted by leaders throughout the Diocese, the object being entirely educational.

A resolution was offered and adopted, in which was expressed the sympathy and deep concern over the death of Dr. C. S. Sargent, at Little Rock, September 21. Dr. Sargent had been rector of Trinity Church, Marshall, for several years, until a few months ago.

After luncheon time was given to the Missionary Centennial, the Woman's Auxiliary celebration, the Church Service League and the Young People's Service League. It was decided to celebrate the Centennial and Auxiliary anniversady after the plans of the national leaders.

Automobiles transported the conference to Camp Allen, Sylvan Beach, in time for a most sumptuous barbecue. Camp Allen is thus named owing to the generosity of Mrs. Allen, who has given her beautiful home for several church gatherings, notably the Boys' and Girls' Camp and the Summer School. Recently Mrs. Allen has built a spacious pavilion in which the conferences were held, and same provided sleeping quarters.

The night session lasted from 8 to 10, and was spent in perfecting plans for carrying out the fall educational campaign.

Recruiting for the ministry occupied the mind of the conference for a considerable time Wednesday. Conferences have been held in two parishes where the subject of the ministry was presented to gatherings of young men. And thus far Texas has five, and other good prospects for the work. Some thought the Church should enlist more young men for lay reading.

A report on Young People's Work, by Rev. Mr. Gordon Reese was received with deep appreciation.

Hearty applause was given when it was announced that Mrs. A. T. Autrey, Houston, had given $50,000 for the Community House at Rice Institute. This building is almost completed, and is, perhaps, the best of its kind in the country.

The clergy renewed their ordination vows in a very impressive service conducted by the Bishop, before adjournment.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Francis L. Coyle became rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Knoxville, Tenn., the middle of September. Mr. Coyle is a Sewanee man, formerly of the Diocese of Louisiana. more recently of Los Angeles.

The Rev. Frederick Luke, curate of All Saints' Cathedral, Spokane, Wash., has accepted a call to become the rector of St. John's Church, Centralia, Wash., and entered upon his duties October 2.

The Rev. George M. Manley, for some years curate of Otey Memorial, Sewanee, Tenn., resigned September 1 to take up work in St. Mark's, Gastonia, N. C., in the District of Asheville. Mr. Manley leaves many warm friends in Sewanee and throughout Tennessee, who regret to see him go, but wish him success and happiness in his new field.

The Rev. Walter Archbold, D. D., rector of St. Andrew's Church, Princess Anne, Md., who has accepted the call recently extended to him by St. Peter's Church, Norfolk, will enter upon his duties the first Sunday in November.

The Rev. J. S. Braithewaite, formerly from the Diocese of New Jersey, assumed charge of St. Stephen's Church (colored), Savannah, Ga., on October 1.

The Rev. Mart Gary Smith, after a service of nearly two years as lay reader, deacon and priest at Holy Trinity Church, Memphis, Tenn., has accepted the rectorship of Christ Church, Hornell, in the Diocese of Western New York.

The Rev. Mortimer W. Glover has resigned from the mission of St. Paul's, Graniteville, S. C., and associate missions, and has accepted a call to St. Bartholomew's Church, Hartsville, S. C.

Bishop Colmore will be in the United States until December 1, when he expects to sail for San Juan. He can be addressed at 281 Fourth Avenue.

The Rev. Robert C. Ten Broeck, instructor in the Sewanee Military Academy, while not canonically resident, has been licensed by the Mishop Coadjutor to officiate in the Diocese, and is engaged in missionary work connected with Otey Memorial Parish, Sewanee.

The Rt. Rev. Daniel S. Tuttle, D. D., Bishop of Missouri, has remitted and terminated the sentence of deposition pronounced upon the Rev. John Norris McFarlane, on November 9, 1887, and has restored him on October, 1921, to the order of a deacon in this Church.

A Renewed Interest In Hymns

St. Matthew's Church
Kenosha, Wis.

"Zfter a year's use of the New Hymnal in this parish I can say that my hopes of it have been justified. It has stimulated congregational singing; it has given our people a renewed interest in hymns and has really added greatly to the spirit of devotion in our services. I consider it the most musician-like collection the American Church has yet produced."

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

While we are true to God, darkness is always the forerunner of brighter light.

Sincerity is the rock on which we should try to build the house of love.

How difficult it is to know—how easy to love Thee!—Unknown.

Every substantial grief has twenty shadows, most of them your own making.—Sydney Smith.

The very soul of our religion is missionary, progressive, world-embracing: it would cease to exist if it disregarded the words of its Founder.—Max Muller.

All the revelations are the gift of stillness. The lake must be calm if the heavens are to be reflected on its surface.—J. Brierler.

Let us come down from the pedestal, if need be, and be little children, that we may begin to be taught the deep things of God.—John R. Mott.

Society could not exist if truth were not more probable than falsehood. There is falsehood enough to necessitate caution; there is still an overplus of truth sufficient to justify confidence.—Dean Vaughan.

Every one of us has a cross to bear. God never mistakes the measure of our strength. He knows when we stagger under the weight laid upon us. He knows, too, when we uphold it. How much we lose when we allow the suffering to weaken our characters instead of strengthening.—E. du Maurier.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., OCTOBER 22, 1921. No. 43.

HOW SHALL WE EXPEDITE PRAYER BOOK REVISION?

We cannot discuss in detail today the questions which are raised between the letter from Bishop Whitehead, published in another column, and the editorial in the Living Church, to which it refers. We shall hope to comment more at length later.

But we can set down these theses:

1. Though the language of the Living Church was a bit severe, and we do not wonder that the Bishop sat up and took indignant notice when the rhetoric of his Commission's report was called "slovenly," yet it is certainly true that it was far from finished; and that a weary lot of time was wasted in Detroit in the Convention's attempt to tinker with it.

2. We agree with the Living Church that a radical change from previous Convention proceedings must be made if we are to get ahead with this Prayer Book Revision.

3. We do not believe that the Bishop's suggestion of an adjourned meeting of the Convention will be practicable. It is going to cost too much money to get to Portland for anybody to have much left to go anywhere else.

4. The one most hopeful improvement which we have heard of is that suggested months ago by the Living Church—namely, that the Bishops should meet some days ahead of the Convention proper to clear up all possible preliminary matters and such subjects as the primary consideration of nominees for Missionary Bishops—which concern their House alone. It has been the failure of the House of Bishops to arrive at any effective action which has kept the Convention from getting anywhere with Prayer Book Revision before. If the Bishops will start sooner, or move faster, we shall make more progress.

DR. SHIPMAN'S ELECTION VINDICATED

So Dr. Shipman's election as Bishop Suffragan in the Diocese of New York is confirmed. To the Southern Churchman that result brings great satisfaction and genuine relief. Our interest in the whole matter had, as we have said before, no personal acquaintance with Dr. Shipman to create it. We were interested simply because, in the attempt to weigh the evidence impartially, we became convinced that success in the effort to prevent the confirmation of Dr. Shipman, or any other man, on the basis of the things which were the most that his opponents could bring forward as the ground of his offending, would violate the finest sense of justice in the Church. The attack upon him looked too much like partisanship. Launched by one of the great Church weeklies, and maintained in its editorial columns—as the Church at large has grown always to expect—with the fairness of a clean fighter, it was taken up by other organizations whose methods reflected no honor either upon themselves or upon their party. Dr. Shipman had had certain associations, and had made (as he himself frankly stated) certain mistakes, which were of the kind to offend the Churchmen who call themselves Catholic; but the question was whether these things were enough to make this man unfit for the bishopric to which a great Diocese had elected him. The overwhelming evidence of those who know him best combined to show in Dr. Shipman a man whose big, positive virtues and abilities so far overshadowed the flaws which were picked in his record that the attack upon him had a jaundiced look. It appeared to many of us that there was an attempt to whip up a partisan spirit which should gratify its own desire to punish somebody for "The Chronicle," and put Dr. Shipman's head on an ecclesiastical pike as an exemplary warning. The Church at large did not take to this pleasing idea; and the Standing Committees, and now in record time, the Bishops have put an end to the matter.

So we join very heartily with the Living Church in its editorial expression of some weeks ago (written as a plea for a swift settlement, one way or the other, of the controversy), that we may now get back to normal. Certainly, in so far as the Church can speak, it has now spoken. The Diocese of New Cork elected Dr. Shipman, after prayer for the guidance of God; the Standing Committees, after having every opportunity to know the facts which Church papers and pamphlets pro and con could furnish, have confirmed that election; and so have the Bishops also. There is not much left for so good a catholic organ as the Living Church to say, except "Amen."

BISHOP GAILOR AND THE PROHIBITION QUESTION

On September 7 the daily papers all over the country carried an Associated Press news dispatch reading as follows:

Salt Lake City, Utah, Sept. 7.—"To me the writing into our Constitution of the Eighteenth Amendment was unpardonable," said the Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, Episcopal Bishop of Tennessee, on the eve of the fourth Synod of the Province of the Pacific of the Episcopal Church, which opened today.

"I take no part in politics; I am neither Republican nor Democrat in such questions," declared Bishop Gailor, "but politicians of both parties have played politics with the good name and the conscience of this country. Whatever in the League of Nations was repugnant could have been written out, but to refuse to countenance any measure for universal peace was nothing but a denial of the principle for which this country went to war.

"As to prohibition, that is a delicate question, but I have always asserted my belief and have never evaded a delicate question. Saloons were going; the Church was making headway against what evil there was in liquor. To my mind, it was nothing short of hysteria that put over a restriction which could not hope to suppress that evil."

This statement was one which the editors of the daily papers, as they looked through the "copy" on their desks, would immediately recognize as having the news value which always attaches to something startling, and they played it up accordingly. In the first paper which came to the notice of the Southern Churchman, the article was on the front page, preceded by a photograph of Bishop Gailor, under the heading, "Head Bishop Says Eighteenth Amendment Due to Hysteria."

Immediately there began to be reactions of opinion from many quarters.

In one of our exchanges, published by another Christian body, there appeared an editorial reading, in part, as follows:

An Associated Press dispatch of recent date carries this quotation from the Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, Episcopal Bishop of Tennessee: "To me the writing into our Constitution of the Eighteenth Amendment was unpardonable. Prohibition is a delicate question. Saloons were going. The Church was making headway against whatever there was in liquor. To my mind, it was nothing short of hysteria that put over a restriction which could not hope to suppress that evil."

This remarkable statement from a noted ecclesiastic raises the question, What is hysteria? Webster defines it: "1. A nervous affection, occurring chiefly in women, in which the patient loses control over the emotions, has imaginary sensations, and often falls into paroxysms or fits. 2. Morbid or convulsive emotionalism or excitement."

Bishop Gailor tells us that this is what happened to the citizens of America who voted the Eighteenth Amendment into our National Constitution by the usual processes. This action, he says, was "unpardonable." Unpardonable by whom? By the God Whose servant the distinguished Bishop is supposed to be? It is preposterous to think that this hysteria for righteousness would be unpardonable in the sight of Jehovah, Whose kingdom is a kingdom of righteousness and Who is a God of righteousness.

Unpardonable by the wives and children of the nation, who have seen such happiness since the passage of the Eighteenth Amendment as they never dreamed existed before? Unpardonable by the business interests of the country, which have enjoyed a period of unprecedented prosperity, due largely to the elimination of the licensed traffic in strong drink? Unpardonable by judges, wardens, superintendents of jails, penitentiaries, reformatories, insane, epileptic and eleemosynary institutions, who with one voice proclaim the beneficial effects of prohibition? * * *

"Saloons were going," says the Bishop. Thank God they were. And credit for it is due those who for a century fought and suffered and baptized the land with martyr blood to make them go. An illustrious example is that of Senator Carmack in the Bishop's own State of Tennessee.

"The Church was making headway against what evil there was in liquor," continues the Bishop. "Against what evil there was!" In God's name, was there any good in it? The liquor traffic was and is evil only, and that continually. According to eminent authorities, it was the prolific source of at least three-fourths, some say 90 per cent., of all the crime, misery, pauperism and insanity that have cursed the world. Even medical science has ruled it out of medicine. "A restriction which could not hope to suppress that evil." Has the Bishop read the reports from authoritative sources, which are published and circulated broadcast, showing that the evil is surely being suppressed? Not only suppressed, but destroyed.

Surely, surely, dear Bishop, Homer nodded sadly this time. This is not the language nor the spirit which should characterize those of the Apostolic Succession. This position is unworthy of a strong leader in a great, historic church. It discourages the saints and causes the enemies of the cross to blaspheme.

From the editorial columns of another widely circulated paper of another Church we gathered this, from which we have left out certain unpleasant phrases:

More astonishing still is Bishop Gailor's announcement of his satisfaction with the situation prior to the passage of the prohibition amendment and laws: Hear him:

"Saloons were going; the Church was making headway against what evil there was in liquor. * * *

"Saloons were going." They certainly were, going at full blast, furnishing refugees for the vilest criminals in their communities, seeking to destroy our young men and to debauch our public life. If Bishop Gailor means that saloons were disappearing, then he simply closes his eyes to a vital factor in the situation. They were not disappearing in any part of the country, save under the brave, resourceful and irresistible opposition of the men and women who believed them evil and only evil, and who were "hysterical" enough to denounce them, with no fear in their hearts save the fear of God. The saloons were "going" in this sense only where an informed and aroused public sentiment drove them out of business and small credit for the creation of this sentiment can be given to priests and prelates. Once more in the history of the human struggle many Christian leaders and many Christian organizations, too, were found out of sympathy with a great moral reform and either actively favoring a traffic which was wholly and irredeemably vile and vicious or else utterly passive and unsympathetic toward any movement for its suppression or extinction. * * *

The whole land is suffering from a spirit of lawlessness, a temper which brooks no restraint and acknowledges no authority. When the most prominent ecclesiastic in a great Christian body denounces a part of the organic law of his land as secured by "nothing short of hysteria," he gives countenance and approval to the current lawlessness and lends his influence to the perpetuation and propagation of a spirit of contempt for all laws which the individual citizen may not happen to like.

The Southern Churchman was disturbed that the name of Bishop Gailor should be linked in the thought of earnest people with repudiation of what they held to be a great ideal. We believed that the Bishop had very probably been misquoted, and immediately therefore we tried to find out directly from the Bishop what it was that he really said. Unfortunately, the Bishop was in the far West.

We received from his secretary about the middle of September a very courteous acknowledgment of our inquiry, and under date of October 5, from Sewanee, came a letter from the Bishop himself.

He writes:

My secretary has just sent me a transcript of your letter asking for information about an interview with me on the subject of prohibition, and I beg to say:

I was not asked by the reporter whether I favored prohibition or not. That is a dead issue. It is settled and done with.

I was asked the plain question, whether I thought that it was wise to write the prohibitory law immediately and peremptorily into the Constitution of the United States, and my reply to that was, that I did not think it wise, and that I believed it was the cause of much of the discontent which prevailed among many of our heretofore law-abiding citizens.

Good people usually make allowance for the desire of newspapers to make a sensation. The reporter used no note-book, but trusted to memory and imagination. I did not use the word "unpardonable."

I am very glad to take the trouble to write this to a brother clergyman, although I cannot reply to some of the vulgar stuff that has been sent me, and I am,

Yours sincerely,

THOMAS F. GAILOR,
Bishop of Tennessee.

We are grateful to the Bishop for his reply. As we surmised, the reporter has added some colors of his own to the Bishop's statement.

One matter remains, however, which we deem so important that we must not be silent about it. The Bishop thinks the enactment of the prohibition amendment was unwise, and evidently he believes it cannot be enforced. On this point, like any other fearless and forthright man, he has indisputable right to his own opinion. We wish to make clear, however—what the Bishop himself, of course, would say, but which the newspaper report beclouds—the fact that in this opinion the Bishop is in no sense an authoritative spokesman for the Church. If the members of this Church are like the rest of the people of the nation, the power of whose increasing public opinion achieved the passage of the prohibition amendment, the majority of them have been, and inferentially are, in favor of it. Furthermore, while this great social experiment is being put to the test, we believe that the Church would wish that its leaders should make clear beyond any mistake the duty of all good men to support the law.

HUDSON STUCK

Being the Address Delivered at Sewanee, Tenn., on Founder's Day, Oct. 10, 1921, at the Unveiling of a Tablet to His Memory; by Rev. Louis Tucker

MEN become great by working nobly at some great task. The elements of greatness may be in them, or in all men, but it needs the great task to make them shine out.

Hudson Stuck was great. To win international reputation as an explorer is no small thing. To be an accepted writer of repute is no small thing. To meet Alaskan pioneers on their own ground and out-work, out-walk, out-starve and out-last them, is no small thing. To be a burning and a shining light, associated in the minds of many thousands with Jesus Christ, so that men, in an empire large as the Trans-Mississippi, thought of him as bearing a cross and pointing up to heaven like a church-steeple walking, is no small thing. But when a man combines all these and adds to them the wistful love of thousands, so that when word went out that Stuck is dead, whole tribes were sorry and dying nations mourned for him—then assuredly that man is great.

The whole English-speaking world, through its newspapers, chronicled the death of Hudson Stuck. The United States and Canada and England and India and South Africa and Australia and New Zealand and Egypt and a thousand islands of the sea, all made some mention of it. Their verdict, the summing-up of their comment, is, "A good man has gone home and we are sorry." Within the English-speaking world, his church—our church, above all others, misses him. Within the church, his university—our university, Sewanee, misses him most. Within his university, his own fraternity, the Deltas, misses him more than any. Pardon the personal touch that within his fraternity few can miss him so much as I.

Two new men, Stuck and Manning, attracted the attention of the Deltas one autumn, and to know them better a trip was arranged to a great cave. It was meant to take them in deeper than usual, and, if possible, seem to lose them. The comedy became a near-tragedy. We went too far beyond the knowledge of our guides into the unexplored chambers and were genuinely lost. Hours later, we at last wandered into a known passage and so came to the upper world again and saw the setting sun. Stuck's calm self-possession had so greatly helped to prevent panic that we thought that possibly he had not realized the danger and asked if he had been afraid. "Yes," he said simply, "very much." Truth-telling such as that appealed to us then—and to him always.

I am not old—I do not count myself as old—but of the splendid group of men both within and without that fraternity who gathered around Stuck, more than half are dead and many of the others have attained eminence. The roll-call of his college friends would be more often answered by "Adsum" from the world spiritual than by "Here" from the earthly life; but many of the earthly answers would be from high places. Most of the men attracted to him spared themselves not at all. They rode carefully, yet recklessly. They died, perhaps, but if they lived, achieved. There was about Stuck himself a certain accurate, quiet recklessness that appealed. He cared for so many unusual things. He held so many usual things lightly. He may have grown weary—we never heard him say so. He may have looked out for his own interests—we never saw him do it. He may have failed to attack what he thought was wrong or error—we never heard of it. As we ourselves were sometimes wrong and heard of it from him, we often questioned his accuracy—unsuccessfully. He made no statements unverified. The passion for accuracy was ingrained in him. While at Sewanee he founded and edited a literary magazine, a magazine as large as, and saving the presence of the professors—more interesting than the "Sewanee Review." He did it without money, without credit, without debt, and apparently without difficulty. It lived for years after he left, and the present "Sewanee purple" is an offshoot from it, established at his suggestion. This magazine was accurate. It made no mistakes. After handing in a contribution, I have had him wake me before dawn to ask where I found a certain word. He had consulted the Professor of Literature—a famous man now—and spent the whole night combing dictionaries and searching glossaries in the library for it in vain.

"There is no such word," he said.

"There ought to be. Is not its meaning plain enough?"

"Yes."

"Then go to bed. I coined it."

He turned and left the room in silence too deep for speech.

This accuracy, this passion for truth, this reckless ability to organize and handle practical affairs lay very deep in him. He always ran our picnics because no one else could do it half so well. When he was Dean of Dallas, proudly placed and in full current of advancement, he wrote me that he was about to resign and go to Alaska. I opposed it—not knowing. His answer was a counter-blast. He had no wife and children. There were twenty years' soft work at home left in him, that some married man could do as well, or ten years' hard work afield. To do Christ's work in the hard places, that was his choice. To do Christ's work in the hard places. To do Christ's work in the hard places. My brothers, he did it.

Of course you know—all the world knows—that according to medical reports, Stuck's death was hastened by disappointment because he was unable to obtain the removal of a canning factory built at the mouth of the Yukon. That is to say, Hudson Stuck died of a broken heart. Why is it that so small a thing could break so great a heart? Because he could not make others see. Through a thousand miles of country under his charge hundreds of men, his friends, walked feebly, reeling with weakness, living skeletons, because their means of living had been taken from them. The factory netted all the fish and the salmon, the main living of the Yukon, no longer run. Stuck had celebrated the marriages for the women, baptized their children, buried their dead. The women were making soup of leaves and moss or, past even that, sat in their empty cabins, busy hands folded, staring at the fire and waiting death because there was no food. Stuck had baptized the children, making them Christians. The little, chubby toddlers that used to run to greet him and cling about his knees—Christ's little people—ran no more to meet him, but lifted languid heads or stretched out claw-like hands to beg the food he could not give them. So like a whirlwind out of the North, he swept across a continent to those who had the power and whose thoughtless ruling had unintentionally caused this anguish and asked it be set right—and could not make them see. Parishes offered him rectorships, we offered him a professorship, but no one could see. Then he went sadly back to his people. The thin men dragged themselves to him with eyes full of hope, and he had to tell them that they hoped in vain. The women weakly rejoiced that he had come back, and he had to tell them that their joy was useless. The little children, what were left of them, crept to his feet and looked up with hungry eyes, and he had to shake his head and turn away. Then he grew heart-sick and at last was weary and lay down and had no will to rise again! And so he died.

Dying, he prayed, for the salmon came up another mouth of the Yukon, where they had not run for a generation, and his people are respited, reprieved for twelve months more. I think that Hudson Stuck took his appeal before a greater seat of government than Washington. I think he laid his people's case at last before One who could understand.

I cannot think of him as dead. Though writing often, we did not meet much after graduation. To me he is a living power, whether present in Alaska or in Paradise. You who are students cannot know what it is to an alumnus to come back and see, as it were, through you, the old alumni in the places that you occupy. 'Tis hard to think of him as not here. Perhaps he is. Let us see.

Hudson Stuck, the Deltas have called a meeting for a sufficient cause. Your name has been called upon the roll!

No, he is not able, or he would have answered.

Hudson Stuck, there is a boy here who is lonely and home-sick, and needs one of the older men to make friends with him!

Not here, or speechless, or he would have answered.

Hudson Stuck, the University of Sewanee, assembled in due order upon Founder's Day, wishes for you.

No, he cannot, or he would have answered.

Hudson Stuck, there is God's work to do in the hard places, the stony places, the cold places.

No, he is dead, or he would have answered.

Hudson Stuck, your helpless friends, reprieved but still in danger, have need of you.

No, he is surely dead, or he would have answered that. He went back from the soft cities; he refused a place here at the University he loved; he gave up life itself to answer that call. I cannot think him dead, but he must be, or that he would have answered.

No man becomes great but by associating himself nobly with some great cause. We gather here today to unveil a tablet to Hudson Stuck. In the long bedes-roll of Sewanee men who died to serve their country and their God, in that clear list of names like precious gems drawn from a golden casket, no name shines brighter. Is there not some one here great enough—nay, can we not all, fraternity, students, alumni, University and Church, measure great enough to carry through the work which dropped from his dying hand, and make for him a living memorial better than carven marble and lettered bronze? If, because of his death, his people here see that his peopl there are made able to find food again, no martyr in the amphitheatre among the lions, no living torch of Nero, no crucified apostle gave ever life so gladly or welcomed death so well as Hudson Stuck.

In the meantime, I am sent here to speak of him, not because close to him—though few were closer, not because I love him—others love him, too, but because—call it dream if you like, call it imagination, call it what you will—I have some dim conception of what he is doing now, and having said so, am called here to tell you:

I know a man who walked, but now shall ride.
At his left side
A cross-hilt sword invisible he bore.
Whenever he came near you could half hear
The clash of unseen golden spurs he wore.
Often when he was nigh you heard nearby
Somewhere a white horse stamping as it stood.
And that all this was so he did not know
And thought himself a poor priest far from good.
But I, who hear in part and dimly see,
Knew him for one of heaven's chivalry.

For oh, my King has captains, and they stand
On either hand
In long bright rows, and one by one they bring
The new men armed aright from the good fight
To stand among the captains of the King.
And neither you nor I shall ride thereby
As not found worthy; but we sometimes mark
Men faithful unto death, to the last breath
Out of the great waste spaces and the dark
And know that they have grown His chosen men
To ride behind Him when He comes again.

Wherefore I dreamed the Knights of the Most High
As they rode by
On great white horses; and they came and came
And, reining past the bed where He lay dead,
Saluted Him, with swords of cold, pure flame.
Tested the true and tried and side by side
The long ranks stood and watched Him, face to face.
Wherefore He roused and rose, whereupon those
His peers and equals made for him due place
And rode with him to where we cannot be.
West-over-sea they went, west-over-sea.

An Incident of Bishop Polk's Ministry

We take the following from a report of Bishop Polk, then Missionary Bishop, to the General Convention of 1841. Besides the Bishop's two "reflections," which are significant, we think it points a further moral to householders in like case.

"From the 10th to the 13th inclusive (of February, 1841), I was occupied in descending Red River to Shreveport, Caddo Parish, Louisiana.

"On Sunday, the 14th, I preached after Divine service, to a congregation assembled in the village, and I will here add the remarkable fact, as I was informed, that not a solitary sermon had been preached in the village by a minister of any denomination, since my visit two years before.

"Two days after I performed Divine service and preached at a village in the interior, between Red River and the Sabine, and after service I admitted a gentleman, his wife and five children to the ordinance of baptism.

"There is something so remarkable in this case, illustrative of the working of our system, that I may be pardoned for mentioning it more in detail. The individual in question was a gallant officer in the late war, and lost a limb in the public service. He was a native of Tennessee, where he resided with his family until within a few years past. Before his removal to Western Louisiana he had placed two of his daughters at school at the Episcopal Female Institute, Columbia, and while there they became attached to the services of the Church, and very naturally aided in interesting their parents also. When the family removed to the West they took with them their Books of Common Prayer, and in 1839, when I first visited them, they were happy in having an opportunity of again using them. The father, who had been very careless on the subject of religion, said to me with great feeling, during the few days I spent with them, that he had never been so impressed with the responsibilities of his position as the head of a family as he had been since his removal to his present residence. He had withdrawn his children from the influence of a settled and well-ordered society, and especially from the restraining and hallowing effect of public religious services. There was no Divine service or preaching of the gospel in all the region round about him, and his conscience smote him in placing his little ones in such perilous circumstances. He was very anxious for me to send him a minister of the Church, and pledged him his hearty support. I could only promise my best exertions in his behalf, and urged him in the mean season to take the Book of Common Prayer, assemble his children and household on every Lord's day, and as priest of his family devoutly to celebrate Divine service. He promised me he would do so. For two years I heard nothing from him. On my second visitation he met me with a countenance beaming with pleasure and told me he had been faithful to his promise, he had done what he could for the instruction of his family, and that while praying with and for them God had touched his heart with a sense of his own necessities and by His Holy Spirit had prompted him to pray for himself. He was not heedless of the heavenly influence, but humbling himself punctually under the mighty hand of God, he had reason to believe his sins had been forgiven him for Jesus' sake, and he was now ready with his household to be baptized into the faith of the Lord Jesus. Accordingly, after the service and sermon above alluded to, I admitted him, his wife and five children to the sacrament of baptism. From such circumstances we are led to two reflections; first, the eminent value of our liturgical services; secondly, the usefulness of our Church institutions for the education of the young in Christian principles."

A "Jeremiad"

Wherein a Layman Makes Complaint.

My friend is a missionary in a remote field, and he seems to find it a satisfaction to talk intimately with me when we meet now and then. He is not at all a Jeremiah; far from it! I have seldom had a more cheerful companion. His contact with the general life of the Church is necessarily limited almost entirely to the Church papers, and he takes all of them. He tells me of many disquieting impressions that he has received of late. (Please understand that he refers to the news of the Church, not to editorials nor to special articles.)

I should explain that the success of his work depends, more than in organized parish work, upon the Church commending herself to the conscience of his several communities, essentially democratic as they are. His own people are profoundly influenced by the conditions that surround them. His personal influence is limited by the great extent of his field, since he can be with his people only once a month in each place.

Is it strange, then, that he should be occasionally moved by the spirit of the gloomy prophet when he sees not a few of his own people accepting for the Church a wrong and humiliating status? "Come, be confirmed," he finds some of them saying to their neighbors in various ways and with various degrees of directness. "The Episcopal Church doesn't object to gambling nor decadent dances nor to your doing anything you please on Sunday, nor to bootlegging, nor to any of a number of things that the community conscience deprecates. Come, be confirmed and get in with the socially elect on their own ground. Come, be confirmed; we will show you religion made easy. Don't mind about the three vows of your baptism. We don't take them seriously ourselves."

His people responded enthusiastically to the Nation-Wide Campaign in 1919 and 1920, and their offerings in these two years have been several fold more than in the years immediately preceding, but now some of them are saying, "Why should we go on giving, out of proportion to what the strong parishes give? These drives have evidently been imposing upon our rustic credulity."

My friend reproaches himself that there should be any such perversion among the people committed to his care, but he tells me that when he reads the Church papers he discovers what appears to him a source of these gross perversions, which lies beyond his reach. He sees the Nation-Wide Campaign for fourteen million dollars a year for missions shrivel before his eyes, so that the treasurer announces an alarming failure on the part of those who signed the sadly diminished pledges to live up even to them. And there appears now no real and general resumption of activity in this third and culminating year (I am writing in the last days of September). He sees, indeed, wonderfully interesting and inspiring data bearing upon the approaching Missionary Centennial, but no definite beginnigs made toward its adequate celebration.

He sees the President of the Presiding Bishop and Council, the spokesman of the newly-constituted central administration, honored and deferred to above all other Bishops, with the single exception of the venerable Presiding Bishop himself, declaring that the prohibition amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the fundamental law of the land, is mere hysteria, and there has appeared no disclaimer that he speaks the mind of Church people generally. If there is one thing upon which the conscience of the small community is settled it is the liquor traffic. The very men who engage in it recognize it as wrong-doing.

He sees clergymen advanced to high honor apparently as a result of their having commended themselves to vestrymen and their friends whose moral attitude is something like that outlined above; who merely patronize the Church and whose real identification is with the economic, political and social interests of the underworld.

He sees little remaining championship of the League of Nations, as embodying the Christian ideal in international relationships, and recalls that one of our most honored Bishops, who was with the army in France, declared some time ago that President Wilson and Senator Lodge were equally at fault in the failure of this measure. He sees growing interference in parochial life on the part of groups of monks who seek to turn the clock back to the fifteenth century, and he finds lay people, who have come under the influence of such teaching, removing into his field and informing the simple natives what the Church really is—a thinly veiled Romanism. And this does not attract the natives! They turn away and a promising beginning shrinks into a mere exotic, out of touch with the community's life and interest. He sees an Episcopal election in a great metropolitan diocese degenerate into a struggle for partisan advantage, causing the enemy to blaspheme.

Is it strange that he should find it hard sledding on his own little trail? But don't imagine that he has balked! He knows Him in Whom he has believed. He knows that the Church's heritage really is, both Catholic and Protestant, uniquely capable of mediating real Church unity; neither puritan nor lax, but steadfastly teaching and guiding her children into the righteousness of free men. He is ,too, something of an Elijah, and knows that God has left Him seven thousand in this Israel who have not bowed the knee to the twentieth century Baal; that in many a parish and mission station, as in his own field, there are the undaunted faithful who live and speak for "the truth as this Church hath received the same."

But I don't envy him his job!

Thousands that are capable of great sacrifices are yet not capable of the little ones which are all that are required of them. God seems to take pleasure in working by degrees; the progress of the truth is as the permeation of leaven, or the growth of a seed; a multitude of successive small sacrifices may work more good in the world than many a large one. What would even our Lord's death on the cross have been, except as the crown of a life in which He died daily, giving Himself, soul, body and spirit to His men and women? —George Macdonald.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE EDITOR OF THE LIVING CHURCH.

[We have received from Bishop Whitehead, of Pittsburgh, a copy of the following open letter, which he desires should be published in other Church papers as well as in the Living Church. On another page we make editorial comment upon some of the points under discussion. —Editor S. C.]

Mr. Editor: The editorial in the Living Church of October 8 very naturally gives me, as chairman of the Commission on the Revision of the Prayer Book, much concern. Your rather wholesale criticism of the reports of the Commission certainly demands prompt rejoinder and comment. Do you not think the word "slovenly" unnecessarily caustic and unbrotherly? I assure you that nothing proceeding from such men as compose the Commission can possibly deserve such an epithet.

Moreover, while we welcome criticism, do you not think it should be kindly and constructive?

Our third report is about to go into the printer's hands in order that it may be published and distributed at least six months before the next General Convention.

Will you favor us immediately with a list of the "bad English," "awkward English," ungrammatical English, wrong capitalization and erroneous punctuation, to which you refer as prominent in former reports? It is only fair that the Commission should have the benefit of your constructive suggestions. Otherwise no advantage will result from your sharp assault.

Apropos of the resolution adopted by the Synod of the Province of the Pacific, advocating expedition in the Revision of the Prayer Book, the Commission heartily concurs in the hope expressed.

I am authorized and requested by the Commission to put before the Church, through the Church press, the following proposal:

Would it not be a possible procedure for the General Convention meeting in Portland to give itself to the very important missionary program and other necessary business, and not take time for Prayer Book Revision?

Then, adjourn to meet in the winter or spring, at some central point, like Chicago, or St. Louis, or Omaha, or Kansas City, to spend a whole week or longer in considering only the report of the Commission. The advantage of this plan needs no demonstration. The Commission desires to have evidence from all parts of the country as to whether the proposal meets with favor. Only note, the plan calls for an adjourned meeting, not a special meeting of the General Convention.

Faithfully yours,
CORTLANDT WHITEHEAD,
Chairman of the Commission.

"THE SEMINARIES AND THE PEOPLE."

Mr. Editor: That was a splendid editorial of yours in regard to extending the influence of the Seminary. I think your suggestions were excellent and I hope that we can carry them out.

W. E. ROLLINS.

Theological Seminary in Virginia, October 9.

October 11, 1921.

Mr. Editor: I have been much interested in reading the excellent editorial on "The Seminaries and the People" in your issue of September 17. Its theme is one that ought to stimulate all our theological schools, and its recommendations are gladly welcomed here at Cambridge. In addition to thanking you for writing it, I am going to take advantage of the suggestion you make when you say, "It may be that some of our seminaries are attempting a service analogous to this (and if such be the case we should like to publish an account of it)." While the possibilities of "extension service" are so great that none of our schools have fully developed them, we have at least made a beginning here at Cambridge, of which you may care to hear a few details. Three of your four definite plans are already in operation at Cambridge. It is our custom, in the first place, to invite to our special lectures by "eminent leaders in the thought or work of the Church," either the general public or a large number of specially selected neighbors, clerical and lay. Furthermore, we make a point of issuing in our quarterly bulletin lists of recent books in the different departments with comments and criticisms by the various members of the faculty. Again, by way of linking the Seminary more closely with the Diocesan Board of Religious Education, we have as one of our lecturers on the faculty the Diocesan Educational Secretary, who gives a course on Religious Education. In addition, we offer each year four or five "extension courses" for the clergy of the Diocese taught by members of the faculty or other qualified instructors. A further fact of wider interest to the Church is that the Commission on the Christian Ministry appointed by General Convention has a Sub-committee on the Education of Men after Ordination, which, among other plans, is considering the possibility of utilizing the seminaries extensively to further the useful type of extension service, of which your article treats.

REAL WORK FOR CHURCH CLUBS.

Mr. Editor: Men's church clubs, so-called, exist in a number of parishes, but, in many cases, they are very remotely concerned with anything that pertains to the direct welfare of the parish, either spiritually or materially. So far as the direct object and result of their meetings are concerned, they might more appropriately be called men's city club, or country club, or club for mutual social entertainment. Even clubs that were started with the idea of being directly beneficial and inspirational to the spiritual life of the parish find it so easy to deviate from that resolution and become a secular club of respectable, but of a coldly, worldly existence.

Those who long for a deep and more earnest spiritual relationship and effort in life, see how much we miss by our unchurchly and parochial life. People go to church and join in the service with a varying degree of attention and earnestness, and that is as far as their church life extends. How greatly the men of the parish could build up the interest in all that pertains to the progress of Christ's kingdom on earth if they were spiritually in earnest and militant. It is deadly indifference or lukewarmness that is holding the Church down. We must ask for, reach out and grasp spiritual power in order that we may first rise ourselves, and then help others.

Once impressed by the fervor of a preacher, Jacob A. Riis decided to throw up editorial work and take to preaching. "No, no, Jacob," said the preacher; "not that. We have preachers enough. What the world needs is consecrated pens." That determined him finally.

It is spiritual fervor and manliness that we need both in the pulpit and new. With this attained, candidates for the ministry would abound, and men's clubs would be a real auxiliary to the Church.

THE COMING CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor: Secretary of State Hughes, not long ago, called the attention of the press to the error prevailing in thinking and speaking of the November international conference as "disarmament conference," and reminded the public that its official name was "limitation of arms conference."

The former title is misleading in that it conveys the idea of complete disarmament, and it has been pointed out that the administration fears that this idea of complete disarmament might so thoroughly possess the public mind in the United States that Representatives in Congress would be afraid to vote sufficient money to provide adequate defense.

It is useless to expect the impossible—the nations are not yet ready for disarmament. If some agreement can be reached as to the "limitation" of armaments in relative degrees, and some conclusions arrived at in regard to the solution of vexed questions in the Far East, the conference will have been worth while a step forward.

Let us all, as Americans and as Christians, hope and pray for the success of the "limitation of arms conference," but let us keep in mind a clear idea what the conference is about.

HORTENSE DAVIS.

THE CHURCH LEAGUE OF THE ISOLATED.

Editor: May I secure your assistance on behalf of the Church League of the Isolated by the publication of the very brief agenda with such additional comment as you may wish?

The League was instituted in 1917 by the activity of widely scattered missionaries interested in the problem of serving the thousands of Churchmen who move into the many unchurched towns of the country, and are, as a consequence, lost to the Church without such a follow-up scheme as we propose. We are now engaged in a campaign to secure the appointment in every diocese and district of some clergyman or layman who will be specially charged with the supervision of these "lost sheep." Mr. Morehouse reports thirty-seven out of ninety dioceses with losses greater than confirmations—surely a great field for our work of tracing the lost. We, therefore, greatly appreciate the help which this publicity will give us in establishing the work in places where it has not already been undertaken.

R. C. TEN BROECK,

Vice-President Church League of the Isolated.

Sewanee, Tenn., Sept. 21, 1921.

A PASTORAL EXPERIENCE.

Mr. Editor: In studying how to best serve young people and to get them interested in active forms of Church work, which, after all, is the best way to serve them, I have naturally faced the question of amusements. Nor has my study been entirely within the bounds of our own communion: I have sought to learn how other religious bodies deal with their young people.

This has naturally brought me to consider the Methodist Church and its prohibition of dancing, card-playing and theater-going. (That some of its members do not observe this prohibition does not concern me—it rather speaks loud against those who retain membership in a religious body forbidding certain things without giving strict obedience to those laws. An outsider begins to wonder whether such members obey any law or rule of their Church.)

In a previous parish I encouraged the older members of the Church in their social affairs where card-playing was engaged in. I set my people an example by attending good plays or seeing good pictures, urging quietly against plays or pictures of a salacious nature. I allowed my young people to dance in the parish house. These dances were always under the direct supervision and chaperonage of Mrs. Wilson and myself, we being the first ones there and the last to leave the hall.

I recall the distinct thrill of pleasure I experienced when a newspaper, not noted for conscientious scruples or pious principles, that scarcely ever mentioned religious matters except in a light vein, came out with an editorial in which it commended the "interest shown in young people by the Rev. and Mrs. Alan Pressley Wilson in chaperoning them in their dances, and the liberal attitude shown by the pastor and his wife." Yet with all this I cannot see that we accomplished anything definite.

As I look back upon that pastorate, one of the happiest experiences in my twenty-five years of preaching the gospel, I am ashamed to note that I had no stronger hold upon my young people than did the pastors of other churches in town. As a matter of fact, the Methodist Church, located just across the street, was more successful in dealing with young people in that more were led into the active work of the church. I allowed dancing, card-playing and theater-going, although I did not participate in the first two amusements, yet I am frank to say that I did not succeed in getting the young people to consecrate themselves to the service of our Lord and His Church.

I can think of but one act of which I was then, and am now, proud. A member of my vestry told me that a certain young man wanted to be confirmed and associate himself with us. Knowing that he was a Methodist, I made direct inquiry as to his reason for wanting to become an Episcopalian. He very frankly told me that the Methodist minister forbid his dancing and that, inasmuch as I allowed it, he wanted to join the Episcopal Church. I think I hurt his feelings and upset traditions when I told him that I would not present for confirmation one whose sole aim was that he be allowed to dance, but I had the commendation of my own conscience.

Now, Mr. Editor, I have taken much time and space to bring myself to say this; with all our liberality in allowing our young people to do as they please, we do not get them except for amusements. With all the handicap of the prohibition of these amusements, the Methodists get and hold young people, training them to be useful citizens and consecrated servants of God. Might we not learn a valuable lesson?

A year or so ago a brother minister advertised for a pastorate where dancing and card-playing were not indulged in. I did not laugh, but I did wonder what had been his experience. I feel now that I know.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor.

THE KU KLUX KLOAK.

In defending this secret organization the other day, one of its members said that a great many outrages were committed, for which the Ku Klux was not to blame. Such a statement is really no defense at all. It is, in fact, simply another reason for disbanding this trouble-making organization.

The Ku Klux Kloak is almost as dangerous as the Ku Klux Klan, and the latter makes the former possible.

On parade the Klan moves under a white sheet behind white masks; in action it moves under a black pall behind black masks. In either case its members are either afraid or ashamed to show their faces. The natural consequences of permitting such an organization to exist in a State are that whenever any band of ruffians in a community wish to get even with somebody whom they are pleased to consider has given them offense, they procure disguises and take unfortunate persons out by night, beat and tar and feather them, and say that the Ku Klux Klan has done it.

It is altogether immaterial whether such a statement is true or false—because the very existence of such a society makes this kind of conduct possible and affords the opportunity of acting under the Ku Klux Kloak.

Any band of men who operate without daring to show their faces is dangerous to a community.

The words of our Saviour, as recorded in the twentieth verse of the third chapter of St. John's gospel, are as true and as applicable to conditions today as they were when He said, "For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light lest his deeds should be reproved."

It seems inconceivable how Christian leaders can fail to use every effort to influence public opinion against any organization whose members are ashamed to show their faces when our Lord has made such a plain statement upon the subject.

AN ARGUMENT THREE THOUSAND MILES LONG.

In thinking of the disarmament conference there is one argument for disarming that should not be overlooked.

It is probably the longest plea for a policy that has ever been made anywhere in the world. It reaches from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans, and is now more than one hundred years old.

It is the unfortified boundary line between the United States and the Dominion of Canada.

There it lies across a continent, that long boundary line stretching, running past lakes and over mountains. It is no expense to either country to keep up, and is an eloquent though silent pleader for friendly relations between two great countries.

As the delegates from all over the world gather in Washington to plan for some limit to the military burdens that are now crushing many European countries, and are exceedingly onerous to the United States, the influence of the long, unprotected, separating line between two nations is bound to make itself felt.

Although President Harding's recent utterances on the subjecting of disarming do not seem very enthusiastic over the outcome, nevertheless even the gathering of representatives from all countries is a move in the right direction.

There is no way for us to estimate the power of popular opinion and the effect of many prayers upon such a gathering, but it will certainly have some weight. Let the Christian forces of the country be on the alert to seize every possible opportunity through mass meetings and public demonstrations to show their desire to disarm, and, above all, let us pray without ceasing.

TWO CALLS.

In delivering an address at the Brotherhood of St. Andrew's Annual Convention in Norfolk on the night of October 13, Bishop Guerry emphasized the fact that the call to the ministry always comes in two ways, as he put it, "There is the inside call and the outside call." The former, of course, means the speaking of a man's inner consciousness, which urges him to devote his life work to the service of God. The outside call is the surrounding circumstances—which either paved the way for the carrying out of this intention or else obstructing it. He directed the attention of his hearers to the fact that in the great Bible characters, it was the outside pressure that had wielded her greater influence in bringing men into the service of God.

Thus it was the burning bush, the leprous hand, the staff vitalized into a serpent, that convinced an unwilling Moses that he had a mission from God.

Samuel was dedicated by his own mother to the temple ministrations, before he had any knowledge of the fact or was consulted in any way.

In the New Testament we see very much the same situation—men did not volunteer for the Master's service—so much as they were drafted into it by our Lord Himself. The command, "Follow Me," was the usual induction into the office of discipleship.

In the case of St. Paul our Saviour Himself appeared to conscript him, and the divine voice told him what to do.

The Bishop, who is one of the thoroughly constructive men in the Church, used these illustrations to point out to those present the need for recruiting officers for the army of God and to suggest that very often we are far too cautious about trying to influence a young man to study for the ministry.

He even went further and made an almost startling suggestion, namely, that vestries should call promising youths to the ministry. The plan that he outlined involved more attention to the growing boys of the congregation than most vestrymen give, but it would be a splendid thing if it could be acted upon.

He said that he believed that it would have an excellent effect and make a deep impression upon young men if, after observation, a vestry were to pass a resolution expressing their belief that some young man of fine character would make a useful minister, and that they as a vestry would be glad to try to render some assistance toward college or seminary education, if such should be necessary, and if he would act upon their invitation. It is certainly a novel idea, but seems so practical and withal so helpful in its suggestions that we pass it on to our readers trusting that it may bear fruit.

THE IMPENDING STRIKE.

As we write this the industrial clouds are gathering and the horizon is dark with storm in the form of a great railroad strike.

Should all appeals to reason and good sense fail and the "walkout" take place, there is one word which should constantly be in our minds and govern our conduct, and that word is Forbearance.

Let us be temperate in our criticisms. The strain will be great, the temptation to violence enormous, because, of course, the efforts to break the strike will be just as strenuous as those to maintain. There will be a tremendous temptation to bitter words and vicious conduct, the suffering that will ensue will be heart-rending. The loss entailed upon both employees and the companies will be beyond calculation, but it will all be made doubly sad if violence of either word or deed is uncontrolled. Let us begin now to cultivate self-control and temperance in word and deed.

Church Intellegence

Prayers For Disarmament

The Presiding Bishop and Council Call for Intercession.

To the Clergy and Laity:

The government of the United States, through our President, has called a conference of the great nations to consider the limitation of armaments and other subjects relating to the peace of the world.

The conference will assemble in the city of Washington on Armistice Day, November 11, and conduct its deliberations during the following weeks.

Therefore the Presiding Bishop and Council asks the clergy and laity of the Church to observe Armistice Day and Sunday, November 13, as days of special intercession to Almighty God, that He will so direct and guide the minds and hearts of the representatives of the nations assembled in this conference, that peace and good will may be permanently established among all peoples of the world, to the glory of God and the extension of the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The following prayers have been approved by the Presiding Bishop and Council, and may be used, during the sessions of the conference, subject to the approval of the Bishops of the several dioceses and districts.

(Signed) Thomas F. Gailor,
President of the Council.

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, Whose blessed Son came into the world to proclaim peace and good-will to men: Have compassion, we beseech Thee, upon Thy children, who are sore oppressed with strife, confusion and discord. Let the sacrifice of our sons and brothers on fields of blood plead with Thee for the restoration of peace and quietness upon the earth. Send Thy Holy Spirit to kindle in the minds and hearts of rulers and statesmen the sense of their obligation to mankind, that war may be abolished, that armaments may cease, and that men of all nations and races may dwell together in unity and concord, to the glory of Thy name and the salvation of the world; through Jesus Christ, our Lord, to Whom with Thee and the Holy Ghost, be honor and glory, now and forevermore. Amen.

O God of all the nations, look down, we beseech Thee, upon us who ask Thy help and blessing. Sustain in us the spirit of justice and humility: enable us to recognize in other peoples and races their virtues, traditions and just rights. Cultivate in us more fully the love of the arts of peace: train us in habits of self-command and simplicity: and so purge our hearts of suspicion of others and increase a confidence in our brethren, that we may keep our place among the nations in peace and good will; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

O God, Who art the Father of all, and Who alone makest men to be of one mind in a house, we beseech Thee, at this time of strife and unrest, to grant to us, by the inspiration of Thy Holy Spirit, a fuller realization of our brotherhood, man with man in Thee; allay all anger and bitterness, and deepen in us a sense of truth and equity in our dealings one with another; for the sake of Thy Son, our Lord, Jesus Christ. Amen.

"The whole future of the world's peace really hinges upon the closest possible fellowship and brotherhood between our nation and yours," declared Rt. Rev. George Lanchester King, D. D., Secretary of the Society for the Propogation of the Gospel, of the Church of England, in an address on Wednesday, October 12, at the Church Missions House, New York, conveying the greetings of his society to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society through the National Council, which is holding its October meeting.

A similar expression of view was given by Sir Robert Williams, President of the Church Missionary Society of the Church of England. Greetings on the occasion of the Centenial were also read from the Church in Japan.

Presenting the greetings of his society to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, Bishop King said:

"We, on our side of the Atlantic, send to you on this side of the Atlantic all love and confidence and hope for the future. As belonging to one Church, and also as belonging to two great nations, we desire a very close drawing together of our hearts because we are really united both as nations and churches of the same great communion. How intensely important it is at such a time as this that America and Great Britain should thoroughly understand one another, and walk side by side without a shadow of distrust or difference of outlook! The whole future of the world's peace, as it seems to us, really hinges upon the closest possible fellowship and brotherhood between our nation and yours; and it is with great joy that we recognize that this good feeling between our two nations is so steadily and effectively fostered by the Church of which we are alike members. It is a great, big spiritual league, joining two nations together, your communion and ours."

The greeting brought from the Church in Japan is as follows:

"Having heard that the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the American Church is celebrating this autumn the one hundredth anniversary of its founding, we desire to convey to the society our heartiest congratulations, and at the same time to put on record our deep appreciation of the work of the society in Japan during the past sixty years. And we further pray that God's abundant blessing may continue to rest upon the labors of the society in both the domestic and foreign fields."

Chairman of the Standing Committee,
Diocese of Tohoku.

Budget For 1922 Reduced

The Presiding Bishop and Council Are Compelled to Postpone Missionary Ventures.

The Presiding Bishop and Council, at its regular meeting in New York in October, faced a great many matters of importance. One of these was the fixing of the budget for the various departments for the year 1922. The Finance Department reported that the income for 1922, based upon reasonable expectations, might be counted on to be $3,750,000, without any provision for the payment of debts incurred before the Council had taken office. It was felt that the budget should be brought as nearly within this figure as possible. It was therefore necessary to cut down some of the askings, important thought the projects might be. Action on the requests of the Continental Domestic Missionary Bishops for $127,900 for the purchase of land and the erection of buildings had to be deferred. The budget of the Department of Missions was further reduced, as were also the budgets of the Departments of Publicity, Nation-Wide Campaign and Religious Education, as well as the American Church Institute for Negroes, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew and other agencies which have been receiving appropriations from the Presiding Bishop and Council. An item of $250,000 was added to the budget on account of payments on the reduction of debts. The Treasurer submitted a report showing that for the first five months of the present year the receipts were $190,586.48 in excess of receipts from dioceses and districts last year for the same period. Then came three months in which the receipts were very much less than in the corresponding months last year, so that up to September 1, 1921, these receipts were actually $2,300.86 less than in the same period of 1920. September shows an increase of $11,936.29 over last year, so that the total receipts up to September 30 are $9,635.43 ahead of last year.

The question of the Conference of the Great Nations to consider the limitation of armaments and other subjects relating to the peace of the world came in for consideration. It was voted that a letter should be sent to the clergy and laity of the Church asking them to observe Armistice Day and Sunday, November 13, as days of special intercession. Special prayers were prepared which will be sent out with the letter, and, if approved by the Bishops of the several dioceses and districts, their use is recommended on these days.

In the report of the Department of Missions it was announced that Japanese friends of St. Paul's Middle School in Japan desired to create an endowment fund of $150,000 for the benefit of the school. Bishop McKim was authorized to proceed to secure for St. Paul's College the license granting the college the academic privileges accorded to imperial universities.

A very interesting proposition for securing to the Church the Murphy Sanatorium in Albuquerque, N. M., was received and referred with power to the Department of the Nation-Wide Campaign.

In the report of the Nation-Wide Campaign Department the resignation of the Rev. J. A. Ten Broeck was offered and accepted with great regret. Mr. Alfred Newberry, one time missionary to Shanghai, and who has been in the Nation-Wide Campaign Department for several years, was elected a General Secretary with special supervision of the Speakers' Bureau. The proposals of the department for the securing of the budget for the next triennium were presented and adopted by the Council.

The Department of Publicity recommended the addition of four new members to the department, the Rev. W. T. Gookin, of Boston, Mass.; Mr. James M. Bennett, of Philadelphia, Pa.; Mr. Charles M. C. K. Puckett, of New York City, and Mr. Arthur M. Hungerford, of Baltimore, Md. The Council unanimously elected these as additional members of the department.

The Committee on Co-ordinated Program for Teaching Missions, Religious Education and Christian Social Service reported by submitting a program which had been considered with great care and approved by the committee. The Department of Publicity was instructed to effect the publication of this program.

The resolution offered by the Bishop of Massachusetts that the Presiding Bishop and Council ask the Commission on the Recruiting of the Ministry of the Department of Religious Education to take such steps as they think advisable to urge the clergy of the Church to present to their people on the Third Sunday in Advent the necessity of a larger number of consecrated, strong and well-equipped young men in the ministry, was adopted.

A telegram was sent at the beginning of the session to the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in its convention in Norfolk, Va., sending the greetings of the Presiding Bishop and Council to the members of the Brotherhood. A telegram in response was received as follows: "Over 1,200 men and boys meeting in Norfolk for thirty-sixth National Convention. Brotherhood of St. Andrew send greetings and pledge loyalty to Church's program for advance. Count on our members as intercessors Centennial Objective."

The meeting occupied two days, with twenty-one members present on the first day and all but three of these on the second. Bishop Sanford, of San Joaquin, who had been elected a member from the Province of the Pacific in place of Bishop Keator, resigned, was present and accorded a welcome.

The Council adjourned to meet again on December 14, 1921.

New Missionaries Sent Abroad.

The business before the Department of Missions, at its regular meeting on October 11, took the entire day. Such matters as the consideration of the budgets of the various fields at home and abroad for the year 1922, the proposed endowment of St. Paul's College, Tokyo; the offer of Japanese friends to provide $150,000 endowment for St. Paul's Middle School, Tokyo., and the report of the Educational Secretary, William C. Sturgis, Ph. D., concerning his visit to the Far East, were all part of the day's program.

The department appointed the following missionaries:

The Rev. Henry Hamblin Chapman, son of the Rev. John W. Chapman, who has for over a quarter of a century been our faithful missionary at Anvik, was appointed to Anvik, Alaska.

The Rev. James Walker, missionary employed in the District of Honolulu, was regularly appointed.

Mrs. Frances Allen Worrall was appointed instructress of nurses at St. Luke's Hospital, Ponce, Porto Rico.

Miss Mary Geraldine Cabot, a nurse, and the Rev. George Ossman were appointed to Anking.

Miss Mary Buchanan McGill, now employed in the field, was regularly appointed as teacher in St. Agnes' School, Kyoto.

Miss Frances Coles Sullivan was appointed for secretarial work, and Miss Agnes Maude Anderson as nurse, in the District of Shanghai.

Miss Edna Belle Murray was appointed music teacher at St. Margaret's School, Tokyo.

The resignation of Dr. I. H. Correll, D. D., who had reached the retiring age, became automatically effective. Because of Dr. Correll's value in the missionary service and his long residence in Japan, the Bishop asked that he be continued in service as a missionary employed in the field for an additional year.

The Rev. John Frith, a native missionary of Liberia, over ninety years of age, was retired.

In the District of Kyoto arrangement was made for the extension of the church at Takata. This church, which looked as if it were cut off in the middle, had done such good work that the members have raised a fund of 2,000 yen, being half the cost of the work to be done. The department gave the Bishop authority to advance the remaining 2,000 yen from sums of money in his hand.

At the meeting of the Presiding Bishop and Council in July there had been referred to the Department of Missions a series of resolutions in reference to the smuggling of morphine into China. The department expressed the opinion that Congress should be petitioned to enact the Jones-Miller anti-narcotic bill, and the Executive Secretary was requested to transmit this action to the proper congressional authorities.

New Co-operation For Christendom

The International Missionary Council Links Many Churches in Mutual Effort.

The latest and finest fruitage of the great co-operative missionary efforts, which began with the World Missionary Conference held in Edinburgh in 1910, is the organization in this month of October, 1921, of the International Missionary Council.

At Lake Mohonk, N. Y., from September 30 to October 6, chosen representatives from national missionary organizations in fourteen countries met together, adopted a constitution, elected officers, studied vast problems and projected a program, all done with the unanimity of spirit and of decision and with confident assurance that they were discovering a providential plan and were following an unseen Leader into larger realms of Christian achievement. The war was unthinkably destructive, but it had not destroyed Christian internationalism in the realm of co-operative endeavor to make the kingdoms of this world to become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ.

Across the conference table a Church of England Bishop, formerly of Madagascar, looked into the eyes of a Japanese Methodist Bishop. Bearing like titles, they represented opposite poles as to ecclesiastical theories of the episcopacy. A Dutch baron and an English baronet faced to the son of a West African chief. Representatives of Australian and South African societies looked across to those of Norway, Sweden and Finland; a Burmese woman doctor of medicine from Rangoon to an American woman doctor of laws from Kentucky. Dr. John R. Mott, of New York, presided, as he had done also at Edinburgh. At his right sat the two secretaries of the meeting, Mr. J. H. Oldham, editor of the International Review of Missions, and the Rev. Dr. A. L. Warnshuis, formerly of China, and at his left the chairman of the Business Committee, Dr. John R. Ritson, secretary of the British and Foreign Bible Society. Many able representatives of the Christian missionary forces of the world who had had extraordinary world contacts sat about that table. Some members had traveled thither for a few hours only. Many had crossed the sea to be present. One had been journeying for forty days to reach Mohonk.

What is the nature of this new world missionary organization that has come into being? Is it some new super-board or super-society that is likely to arrogate to itself administrative functions which will arouse suspicion and distrust here and yonder? Will it embarrass missionary leaders with respect to those matters of faith and order which are so inextricably intertwined with rock-bottom religious convictions in each of us?

Not so. The Council is established on the basis that the only bodies entitled to determine missionary policy are the missionary societies and boards, or the churches which they represent, and the churches in the mission field. It is recognized that the successful working of the International Missionary Council is entirely dependent on the gift from God of the spirit of fellowship, mutual understanding and desire to co-operate. The Council is constituted by the national missionary organizations in the different countries. The term "national missionary organization" is used to describe the interdenominational conferences or committees in which in different sending countries the missionary societies are united for common consultation and co-operation, it being noted, however, that the Foreign Missions Conference of North America is international, including the mission boards both of the United States and Canada. Except as may be determined otherwise by subsequent action of the Council, representation is to be as follows: Foreign Missions Conference of North America (United States and Canada), 20; Conference of Missionary Societies in Great Britain and Ireland, 14; Australia, 2; New Zealand, 1; South Africa, 2; German Missionsausschuss, 6; France, 4; Dutch Committee of Advice, 2; Swedish General Missionary Conference, 2; Switzerland, 2; Norway, 2; Danish Missionary Council, 2; National Joint Missions Committee of Finland, 1; Belgium, 1; Japan Continuation Committee, 3; China Continuation Committee, 3; National Missionary Council of India, 3. Two out of three representatives each from Japan, China and India are to be nationals of these countries.

The functions of the Council are the following: (a) To stimulate thinking and investigation on missionary questions: to enlist in the solution of these questions the best knowledge and experience to be found in all countries and to make the results available for all missionary societies and missions. (b) To help to co-ordinate the activities of the national missionary organizations of the different countries and of the societies they represent and to bring about united action where necessary in missionary matters. (c) Through common consultation to help to unite Christian public opinion in support of freedom of conscience and religion and of missionary liberty. (d)

To help to unite the Christian forces of the world in seeking justice in international and inter-racial relations, especially where politically weaker people are involved. (e) To be responsible for the publication of the "International Review of Missions" and such other publications as in the judgment of the committee may contribute to the study of missionary questions. (f) To call another World Missionary Conference if and when this should be desirable.

Recognizing that the International Missionary Council has been brought into being as representing the national missionary organizations of the various countries, for the purpose of investigation and co-operation within the appropriate sphere of these organizations, and, therefore, is not to be considered as representing churches or ecclesiastical organizations as such, the following declaration as governing its deliberations and as conditioning its commendation of other conferences of a missionary character, was adopted:

No decision shall be sought from the Council and no statement shall be issued on any matter involving an ecclesiastical or doctrinal question, on which the members of the Council or the bodies constituting the Council may differ among themselves.

No representatives from Germany were present at the Lake Mohonk meeting. The German leaders were not yet ready to accept the urgent and repeated invitations to rejoin the international fellowship in missionary endeavor. But German missions, missionaries and home leadership were never out of mind at the meeting of the Council. Intercessory prayer, discussion and informal conversation were redolent with unfeigned and eager yearning for the renewal of relationships with the German brethren.

With respect to the exclusion of German missionaries from many fields, the Council declared its belief that this "inflicts deep injury upon the spiritual life of Germany by preventing the expression of vital spiritual forces, weakens the hands of international spiritual fellowship, deprives non-Christian peoples of help otherwise available, and retards the development of abiding friendship among the nations." Believing that the continuance of these restrictions "endangers the principle of religious liberty which is a vital interest of the Christian Church," the Council further placed on record its conviction that "the wounds of the war cannot be fully healed until the way is opened for German missionaries to resume foreign missionary work." * * *

Other restrictions upon missionary work in certain colonial areas, especially in Africa, received careful consideration, and methods of procedure were proposed in order if possible to secure an easement of these restrictions.

A momentous discussion was had on "Church and Mission." The special committee having to do with this subject was composed of board secretaries, missionaries and representatives of the rising churches in mission lands. In order that this special committee might have before it a frank statement of the most forward looking thought from the group last named, the Japanese, Chinese, East Indian and African members of the committee, acting as a sub-committee, were asked to frame a statement indicating what they felt should be the relation between the developing indigenous churches on the field and the missionaries.

1. Whether, with a view to minimizing the disadvantage referred to, and promoting native leadership, it is desirable in certain fields that foreign missionaries should be related to and serve under the direction of the constituted ecclesiastical authorities of the country to which they are sent, and that they should have the same ecclesiastical status as that of corresponding indigenous workers.

2. Whether it would be more in harmony with the spirit of brotherly co-operation and of rightly serving the Church of the country that all questions affecting the program of Christianity should be discussed by natives and foreigners meeting together, rather than such matters should be determined by a mission council or other body composed exclusively or preponderantly of foreigners; and hence, where it is not possible on the grounds stated above, or for other reasons, to transfer the direction of all Christian activities to the indigenous Church, how best an opportunity may be given to the native Church of expressing its mind in regard to missionary policies falling at present within the purview of the mission body.

Such questions the Council could only "refer for consideration to the mission boards and societies and through them, if so desired, to the missions and churches in the mission field," recognizing at the same time the differences in polity and practice of the several churches, the different stages of development of mission work and the varied conditions in different mission fields, the earnest consideration already given by many missionaries to the question of transferring responsibility to the indigenous Church, and the presupposition involved in the questions that a strong indigenous Church and a capable native leadership are already in existence.

The discussion of Christian Education in the mission field was notable. Other topics receiving consideration were Christian literature, the relation of missionaries to public questions, the preparation of missionaries, the International Review of Missions, and the traffic in narcotics as an international problem.

With reference to the forthcoming conference at Washington on the Limitation of Armaments, the Council passed this resolution:

The Council contemplates with deep thankfulness and solicitude the assembling of the international conference at Washington. The momentous issues to be considered will profoundly affect the peace and well-being of many peoples. Our earnest prayer to God is that such wisdom may be given to the delegates that their deliberations may result in the discovery and acceptance of agreements that shall be the political equivalent of those principles of brotherhood taught by Jesus Christ, which principles we believe command the assent of a vast and increasing number among all nations.

We cannot doubt that, should the result of the conference be a concert of judgment and action significant for justice and peace in the world, this brotherhood of Christians in every nation and of every name would with new hope and confidence give themselves to the promotion of these principles among all men everywhere. For such high enterprise we, assembled from among the missionary forces of many peoples, for ourselves and, so far as we may, for those whom we represent, make solemn pledge of that highest service which in Christ's name we can render.

Of this new International Missionary Council, Dr. John R. Mott was elected chairman, and Mr. J. H. Oldham, M. A., and the Rev. A. L. Warnshuis, D. D., were elected secretaries. Mr. Oldham and Miss G. A. Gollock were elected joint editors of the International Review of Missions, all to serve until the next regular meeting or until their successors are elected.

The Committee of Council, appointed to serve until the next meeting of the International Missionary Council, includes the following: North America—The Rev. Arthur J. Brown, D. D., LL. D., the Rev. James H. Franklin, D. D., the Rev. Frank Mason North, D. D., LL. D., the Hon. Newton W. Rowell, LL. O., K. C., Mrs. Henry W. Peabody, the Rev. Charles R. Watson, D. D.; Great Britain—The Rev. R. Forgan, D. D., the Rt. Rev. George Lanchester King, D. D., the Rev. John H. Ritson, D. D., Colonel Sir Robert Williams, Bt., M. P.; Continental Europe—Baron C. W. Th. van Boetzelaer van Dubbledam, M. Daniel Couve. The officers of the Council are made ex-officio members of this Committee of Council.

It is expected that the next meeting of the Council will be held on the Continent of Europe in 1923.

Dr. McComb Goes to Cambridge Theological School.

The Rev. Samuel McComb, D. D., preaching canon of the new Cathedral in Baltimore, has accepted the invitation of the trustees of the Episcopal Theological School at Cambridge to become professor of homilectics and pastoral care, and will enter upon his new duties about February 1, 1922.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor.

Opening of the New St. Andrew's Church, Norfolk.

The new St. Andrew's Church, Norfolk, the Rev. Myron B. Marshall, rector, was opened for service on Sunday, October 9, with an early celebration of the Holy Communion at half past 7 in the morning, a second celebration of the Holy Communion at 11 o'clock, and Evening Prayer at 8 o'clock.

This new church has been in the process of building for more than two years. It is cruciform in shape, with an exterior of brick construction. The chancel is beautiful and ample, being lined with a paneling of quartered oak with an old English finish. The walls are of a blended color, giving a general effect of gray, harmonizing with the whole color scheme. The ambulatory around the chancel and behind the reredos makes the processional peculiarly effective. Above the chancel is a beautiful memorial window executed by Gorham & Co., depicting the last command of our Lord to His disciples, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," while above the entrance to the choir is a rude beam of exquisite proportions bearing the same inscription. An indirect lighting system completely illuminates the chancel with a flood of light without trying the eyes of the congregation. In the west transept is a well executed window, whose subject is, "The Annunciation to Zacharias," being the first of a series of windows representing scenes connected with the life of our Lord which will eventually surround the nave of the church.

This new church building has a seat-

Thirty-Sixth National Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States

Summary of the Convention by Mr. Randall.

Mr. George H. Randall, convention manager, editor of St. Andrew's Cross and the associate general secretary of the Brotherhood, said at the last meeting on Saturday night that the convention in Norfolk was one of the best he had attended in recent years.

"We who are guests in Norfolk," he said, "desire it to be well known that the convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew just ended has been one of the largest and one of the best in recent years. In fact, were the truth told, it has been larger in numbers attending than several of our conventions held in cities of far greater population. One feature of the city's welcome in a general way attracted our attention at once, and that was the electrically lighted St. Andrew's cross suspended just below the dome of the City Hall. It was a graceful tribute on the part of the people through their Mayor. And the Chamber of Commerce and street railway company were equally alert to show us a very genuine brand of Southern hospitality. The red electric lighted cross suspended high on the noble tower of Christ Church, and which was seen from far out on the Roads, was another evidence of your people's hospitality.

"The Norfolk convention of the Brotherhood was the first in the long series of thirty-six annual conventions to give a whole day to an excursion that took all the delegates far out of town. The Jamestown and Williamsburg pilgrimage was decidedly unique. It was such an innovation that, when in a spirit of hospitality the trip was proposed to us by the Norfolk committee, we were inclined to be conservative and turn it down as being too venturesome—partly owing to the uncertainty of what the weather man might do to us. But the wisdom and eagerness of our hosts prevailed. The day of the excursion was perfect. The Pennsylvania Railroad gave us a comfortable and commodious steamer, the people of Williamsburg furnished an abundance of automobiles, and the special bringing of our delegates back from Williamsburg to Newport News was on time to the dot. It was a wonderful trip, one of the truly great events of recent conventions."

Churches of All Denominations Opened to Brotherhood Speakers.

Another unusual feature of the convention was that on Sunday morning, October 16, not only the Episcopal Churches, but the churches of all denominations as well, opened their churches to speakers of the Brotherhood, who talked on the subject, "Am I My Brother's Keeper?"

Camp Fire Meeting for Juniors.

On Saturday evening a camp fire meeting, constituting, perhaps, the most impressive and beautiful service of the entire week, closed the Junior convention. More than a hundred of the youthful delegates gathered in an earnest circle around a big open fire at City Park and heard Canon Skey, of Toronto, explain the meaning of the Holy Communion, which the boys were to take in a body on Sunday morning at 7:30 in Christ Church. It was the kind of service to appeal most strongly to the Junior delegates, reminding them of the delights of a camp at night. The fire was built close to the water's edge, where the boys, if they took their eyes from the blazing logs, could look out over the shimmering surface and worship with the service unmarred by the thought of being behind four walls. The talk of Canon Skey was simple and beautiful. After explaining the deeper meaning of the service, that it was the figurative giving of one's body to God as Christ had given His body for men on Mt. Calvary, he pleaded with the boys to partake of the sacrament today in the right spirit, offering their lives to the Master to use as He saw fit. Before the talk of Canon Skey a number of camp fire stories, befitting the service, were told by other speakers, while the boys munched apples passed around by leaders.

Helpful Thoughts Strikingly Emphasized.

The general theme of the convention was, "Strengthening the Stakes." The prime necessity for Christian knowledge, Christian living and Christian service as the best and only means of solving the economic, industrial, political, social and religious problems of the time was emphasized throughout the entire convention. Strong appeals were made for greater Brotherhoods as a splendid means for accomplishing this end and purpose.

The Rev. Dr. William A. R. Goodwin pleaded for more definite clear-cut church teaching as an ideal way of increasing one's personal power for personal service.

Canon Lawrence Skey told the Juniors that as God had sent Jesus on earth to accomplish a special and unique mission, so God had a special mission on earth for each man. To fulfil this mission each must first believe in God. Then as the plan is revealed day by day it must be followed. To the general public he said that every man should not feel right and easy in his conscience until he had offered to do the work of ministry for God—and that, too, in the mission fields and in the hard places for service. Then, if he were absolutely prevented, he might conscientiously undertake lesser work.

Bishop Walter Overs gave many striking illustrations of the great need and opportunity there is today for men of heroic courage, physical strength and trained intellect in the work of the Church.

Every day during the convention there was a quiet talk on the Bible by Dr. W. H. Griffith Thomas. These were one of the most helpful and stimulating features. He emphasized the importance of a right use of the Bible as the only sure foundation upon which to build Christian life in all of its phases. The Bible must be the foundation of all effective prayer, preaching, teaching and service.

Dr. Hubert Carleton, of Wilmette, Ill., in speaking on the Christian Ministry, criticized State universities and colleges for putting too little stress on religious teaching, consequently training few men for the ministry. But for the denominational colleges and their work in giving religious training, the Church would have to close its doors, for too few men go into the ministry from State educational institutions to meet the needs of the Church for clergymen.

Bishop W. A. Guerry, of South Carolina, expressed the opinion that the Church should return to the Apostolic method of seeking out young men qualified for the work of the ministry and presenting the matter to them strongly. He scored the idea of offering greater inducements to young men to enter the ministerial service, such as greater salaries. "God help the Church when salary is an inducement to a boy to take up Christian work. The joy of service for the Master is the most impelling motive to turn young men towards the ministry."

The convention next year will be held in Seattle, Wash.

Special Services in Norfolk Churches.

On October 2 Dr. D. W. Howard, of St. Luke's Church, celebrated his fourteenth anniversary with impressive services, both of which were well attended by his devoted congregation.

A ceremony in which religion and patriotism were linked and which left several hundred men and women vastly impressed with the solemnity of the occasion, marked the dedication Sunday afternoon, October 9, of the new colors of Women's Post, No. 118, American Legion, at Christ Church. The Rev. F. C. Steinmetz, rector of the church, conducted the dedicatory services, assisted by Rev. W. E. Callender and the Christ Church choir. The ceremony was attended by a distinguished assemblage, which included Governor Westmoreland Davis, several officers of the Army, Navy and Marine Corps, officials of the United States Public Health Service and veterans of three wars.

Norfolk Clericus: The opening business meeting of the Norfolk Clericus was on Monday, October 3, at St. Paul's Church. The anual Corporate Communion was held in the church, after which the members adjourned to the Parish House and proceeded to the discussion of business. A committee, composed of the Rev. J. S. Meredith, Dr. W. A. Brown and the Rev. Charles H. Holmead, were appointed to make plans looking towards the establishment in the city of a training school for the Sunday school teachers and workers of all the Episcopal Churches.

The new parish house and Sunday school building of Ascension Church will be completed by the middle of November, and will greatly facilitate the work of that parish. It is a brick building with stone trimmings, slate roof and steam heat, and will have twenty-six class-rooms and a large auditorium.

St. Paul's Church, Berkley, is just completing extensive interior repairs and decoration at a cost of $1,000.

In Honor of Dr. Brown: On September 20 formal welcome on his return from Europe, where he attended the international convention of the Rotary Club, was extended Dr. W. A. Brown, rector of St. John's Church, by the men's Bible class at the parish house. There was a supper, at which all of those who taught the class during the absence of Dr. Brown were guests, and Dr. H. H. Covington, rector of St. Paul's Church, Norfolk, who gave the welcoming address.

The Rejoicing of Jesus.

Elizabeth G. Legare.

Awake, O Church of God, and claim
Your dear-bought heritage;
Nor shrink, but scorn anew the shame,
All fired with righteous rage.
The hosts of darkness are combined
To conquer in the strife;
But lo! about you strong are lined
The powers of light and life.

Your Leader once rejoiced to see
As lightning Satan fall.
Now gird you to strive worthily
Your foes you will appal.
This great adventure all may aid,
The humblest has his share;
A crucial task on us is laid,
Truly the call is clear.

A world tumultous, guideless, torn,
And reckless of the end—
In the far East behold the dawn!
Our utmost we must spend.
Think, in this warfare you may be
A slacker, and retard
The glorious day of victory,
The triumph of the Lord.

The travail of His soul, 'tis said,
Shall yet be satisfied;
And though the fullest price He paid,
His joy, how long denied?
Up! Captains, lead your willing host
With burning words of cheer;
Not counting what may be the cost
So that His task we share.

And soon the wondrous song will sound,
Rejoice, rejoice ,O earth!
Satan in lowest depths is bound,
Humanity's new birth.
There's joy in heaven o'er one saved soul,
What should the Master's be!
Jesus! grant strength to win the whole
Of Thy great world to Thee.

The Inner Light.

Mary Graham.

"What a gloomy looking place this is!" said Nellie Blakiston to herself as she entered the corridor of the Mercantile Library one hot Wednesday in August, at a little after 12 o'clock. The gloom seemed to be somewhat relieved by groups of merry boys and girls who were taking their recess from their studies in a fine business college on the second floor. But poor Nellie was in no mood to enter into their mirth. Everything had gone wrong with her this week, and the prospect seemed darker than ever before since her dear mother had left her some years ago.

Only the day before she had a quarrel with her fiance and they had parted seemingly forever. Today her employer had given her some sharp words of reproof for some mistakes she had made in her bookkeeping, and almost immediately afterward had asked her if she would mind taking back a book to the library, as he had a sudden call from the city, and he strongly objected to paying fines, rich man as he was.

"Nearly three squares from the Alcott dining-room, on such a hot, dusty day, and only one hour to do everything before I go back to the office. How could he ask me to do such a thing after the round scolding that he had just given me?"

These were the gloomy thoughts with which she approached the desk and handed the book to a pleasant-faced girl of about her own age, without a nod or a smile or "good morning." (For it is always "morning" before lunch time in Philadelphia, no matter what time that function may be.) She merely gave the name of the owner of the share and replied in the negative when the clerk pleasantly asked her if she wanted another book.

The boys and girls from the college upstairs were still in the corridor, and a few were on the steps outside. She stood there a moment and looked at them, silently wishing that she could be as happy as they seemed to be, and as she herself had been, only yesterday. Just then she was startled by the sound of a church-bell, accompanied by some soft chimes playing the familiar hymn, "Rock of Ages." Looking over to the other side of the street, she saw a number of people entering the church. A wedding or a funeral, perhaps? For not being Lent, there was no usual mid-day service, except for something special. Through the crowded street she made her way to the East Side, and then felt impelled by some impulse to follow another girl who was entering the church.

An elderly gentleman showed her a seat, and a sweet calmness came over her as the organ played softly her favorite, "Largo." Soon the service began with the singing of the familiar hymn, "Just As I Am." A lady handed her one of the service books, and she found herself joining heartily in the singing. It had warmed and brightened her heart to be treated with such kindness the moment she had entered the church, a perfect stranger.

After a short prayer and another hymn, the minister made a comforting talk, his text being "The Kingdom of Heaven Is Within You." That thought came to her as something entirely new, although she must have heard it many times before. She had never before seemed to grasp its meaning. Even as a child she had joined with many other children in singing lustily, "There Is a Happy Land, Far, Far, Far Away!" And very far away it had always seemed to her, especially after her mother's death. Before she had entered the church she had been wishing with all her heart that she might follow her mother to an early grave and to the heaven where she was assured she must be. But life stretched before her would be such a long time to wait before she should join her mother in that happy kingdom.

Yet now the minister was telling her that she could have heaven right now in her own heart, if she would open the door for the Divine Presence. As the congregation knelt in prayer she sent an earnest petition that this supernatural brightness might be granted to her. She listened to the last note of the beautiful organ before she left the church. How different were her feelings as she left from what they were when she had entered it! She made her way to the Alcott dining-room. The service had taken about half an hour, and she had about ten minutes left for lunch. She spoke a kind word to the waitress, whose face flushed with pleasure. She felt like shouting to her friends around her, "The kingdom of heaven is within you!" but knew she would be considered as out of her mind, or as a religious fanatic. She contented herself with letting the inward brightness shine out, with a rapturous greeting to all whom she knew. Even the "swell" lady who took her check and money at the door noticed the difference.

Nellie found her employer still at the office, as he could not get off on the train he had hoped to. Somehow he did not seem half so cross and disagreeable as he had earlier in the day. Everything looked different to her, now that she had opened the door of her heart for the Light which had come to her, and would remain with her for the rest of her life.

Ye Shall "See" Me Again.

In John 16:19 there are two Greek words used which are both translated, "to see." This distinction is ignored in the Authorized Version, which reads: "A little while and ye shall see (theorite) me not, and again a little while and ye shall see (opsesthe) me."

The word theorite refers to physical sight depending on the bodily organs. The word opsesthe refers to perception independent of the bodily organs. It is used of the insight of the metaphysician, of the spiritual vision of the seer, of the impressions of the genuine clairvoyant, of the awakened intuitions of the mystic, which enable him to penetrate beyond the veil of the world of sense and see that which is invisible. It is used in the New Testament more than thirty times of spiritual sight as opposed to physical sight.

Our Lord's words then, which were apparently unappreciated by the disciples, emphasized the contrast between the two worlds of sense and spirit, upon the boundaries of which He was hovering and lingering (as it were) during the forty days between Resurrection and Ascension.

Paraphrased, the words would signify: "In a short time my bodily Presence, which you have beheld with your physical eyes, shall pass from our sight, but soon, after a brief period, during which ye shall weep and lament, ye shall receive a gift of spiritual sight and under the illumination of this Pentecostal afflatus a recognition of My nearness shall break upon your heart and shall fill you with undaunted courage and fearless faith, for ye shall 'see' Me in a new and never fading way."

The distinction between the two words emphasizes powerfully a master secret of human life. Human individuality includes a dual consciousness, yet a triple consciousness: sub-consciousness links the soul through instinct to her immemorial past of race experience. Consciousness through the senses and intellect links her to her present correspondence with matter, time and space; while a profounder consciousness through spiritual intuition links us to universal life and reaches to that beyond the senses into a deeper reality and world of spirit. In this super-consciousness there are no barriers to be penetrated, no chasms to be bridged, no insulations to be avoided; there is an immediacy of contact, a sameness of substance, a unity of selfhood. We shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is, and we shall endure as seeing the invisible.—The Good News.

PARABLES OF SAFED THE SAGE.

The Parable of the Laundry.

The wagon of the laundryman stopped at the door and left a package. And Keturah opened it and checked up the contents. And she said, Two of thy collars are missing, and one cuff; and thy pajamas have lost a sleeve.

And I went unto the telephone, and I said unto the maiden at the laundry, I beseech of thee, send unto me the missing portions of my attire.

And she said unto me, Our manager is out; thou wilt have to see him.

And I went to the laundry, and I entered it as the manager entered. And I had in mind to say unto him that his service had grown intolerable, and that he no longer cleaned collars, but sharpened them and put saw teeth upon the edges of them, and that what clothes he did not lose he ruined.

And as the manager entered, there came unto him one of his assistants, who said unto him, The man at the factory saith that he cannot put in that crank-shaft for two weeks.

And his bookkeeper said unto him, The driver of No. 3 hath quit, for he had an opportunity to become a chauffeur for Old Jones, who liveth on the boulevard; and how shall we deliver the laundry on his run?

And the forewoman in the ironing-room said unto him, Saidee is home sick, and Fanny hath gone to the movies, and Kitty hath sent word that she must attend her grandmother's funeral, which is probably the football game; and two of the machines in my room are shut down, and the people are kicking because they have not their clothes.

And the telephone girl said, We have complaints from the families whose names and number I have here, and they desire that you call them up and explain.

And he said, I will call them up, but it shall be some time in the very remote future; I have troubles enough.

And other of his assistants told him that they were nearly out of soap, and that the people who sold starch had sent word that they could not fill the order for ten days.

And I entered the ironing-room, where many women worked, and I heard them talking as they worked, and all that I heard them say was, And he said to me, and I said to him.

And I looked into the washing-room, and there was steam, and suds, and sweat.

And the manager greeted me with a tired look, as if he were to say, And hast thou brought to add to my troubles?

And I said unto him, I came to complain of certain lost garments, but I forbear.

And he said pleasantly, Nevertheless, let me know thy complaint, and we will endeavor to make it right.

And we went to the sorting-room, and I saw how the girls sorted the laundry, and I thought if any man did ever get what was coming to him, it would have been by special providence. And there was a pile of arms from shirts, and legs from other garments, and many things beside. And I found the arm of my pajamas.

And I returned unto Keturah, and I said, I will complain no more concerning the man of the laundry. He hath troubles enough, and I wonder that he doeth as well as he doth.

And I considered that it might be the same if I knew more of the affairs of other men concerning whom I have been impatient. And it may that if men could look into the place in which I endeavor to do my part in cleaning up the world, they would be more patient with me.—Presbyterian Banner.

A Modern Book of Acts.

I am sure many of you would have enjoyed coming with me on this trip. We passed through hills and valleys, and innumerable villages, large and small. How can I describe it all to you? China is a beautiful land. This is in spite of the many sights that make us sad, for the people know not God and are sunk in sin amidst idolatry and debasing superstitions.

It is springtime and the hills are simply covered with flowers of all kinds, pink and scarlet azalias, blue wisteria, rich yellow rhododendrons, all in full bloom (I counted twenty-eight blooms on one stalk I picked). Then there are large single white roses, and an endless variety of climbers, such as jasmine and honeysuckle. They grow in wild profusion, covering often tall trees in their embrace, and sending out a fragrance on every side. What a field for the naturalist!

As I walk along, lizards of brilliant color dart here and there, while frogs, green and brown, take flight at our approach and jump into the paddy fields. Many kinds of butterflies flit here and there in the air around, some of them in color like pieces of black velvet fringed with crimson, others a dark brown with a ribbon of blue stretched from wing to wing, some a saffron yellow, others a copper brown. Then there are the big-eyed dragonflies with luminous bodies several inches long, pale blue, green, yellow or bright crimson; in the evening, fireflies dart about lighting up dark spots with their tiny glow.

How beautiful the country looks! The wheat will soon be ripe, the golden ears are already filling out, the beans and peas have flowered, while little carpets of bright green mark the plots of the first planting of young rice, which looks like grass. It will shortly have to be replanted out into the larger fields, which are now being ploughed up by water buffalo under about a foot of water, the fields looking like miniature ponds. Every one is busy.
is very busy.

We stay a while at most of the large villages on the way and have our meals at an inn. We can always get cooked rice and usually eggs as well. We sit down with our rice bowl in one hand and our chopsticks in the other just as the other guests.

How I should like to describe to you what I see—the villages, the lovely mountain streams, the quaint bridges of wood or of stone.

We arrive at our destination at last, the city of Tehsing. It is not a large place; for the most part consisting of one street about a mile long, full of irregular buildings, shops and dwelling houses. Hills surround it on every side. Further off are the higher mountain ranges. A lovely broad stream of water runs swiftly past the city, in places bubbling and rushing over huge rocks and boulders forming little cataracts of white foaming water, sparkling in the sun, while in the deeper spots the water changes from deep blue to pale green.

Some four years ago work was started in this city. After it was first visited a small place was rented and later on a larger one.

In the beginning of the work there was opposition, then, as is always the case with a new work, a number of people came round with various motives. These gradually dropped off when they found that no material help was given and that we did not interfere in law cases; then a few became really interested, and last week we had the joy of baptizing five.

There are many other inquirers I would like to tell you of in this city of Tehsing, but these are the first five to be baptized and will no doubt be specially marked out by the adversary for attack, for they have come out boldly for Christ, and went into the river publicly to be baptized before a crowd of city people.

On my return journey I spent a time at the village of Mr. Liu, the leather worker. There are about six hundred families living in that place. In the evening I was asked to go to the ancestral hall to speak. The place was packed with an interested audience, and there the evangelist and I preached Christ. Please pray—in faith—for all this scattered seed. Paul may plant and Apollos water, but God gives the increase.—P. V. Ambler, in China's Missions.

The Revealing Crisis.

We are always inclined to look for some joy or sorrow as that which will stir the energies of our souls; for some sharp sickness or bereavement as that which will make us trust more faithfully in God; for some blessing or deliverance as that which shall bring us to love Him with tender devotion. But when these exceptional events happen, they do but reveal to us what we have already become; then, at length, when our eyes are opened we see ourselves; then we know what we are; then we realize the value of little things; the abiding results of routine; then we marvel, it may be, to know assuredly that we despised Christ when He came to us in strange disguises: or it may be that we welcomed Him in the least of His little ones, or in the most insignificant of His workings. Great occasions do not make heroes or cowards; they simply unveil them to the eyes of men. Silently and imperceptibly, as we wake and sleep, we grow and wax strong, or we fail and wax weak, until at last some crisis shows us what we have become.—Canon Westcott.

For the Young Folks

Make Channels for the Streams of Love.

Make channels for the streams of love,
Where they may broadly run;
And love has overflowing streams,
To fill them every one.

But if at any time we cease
Such channels to provide,
The very founts of love for us
Will soon be parched and dried.

For we must share, if we would keep
That blessing from above;
Ceasing to give, we cease to have,
Such is the law of love.

The Fairy Ring.

E. C. Brown.

"Do you believe in fairies?" asked Mary.

Her eyes rested on the two younger children seated in the fairy ring of buttercups with an expression which said more plainly than words: "I am too old to believe in such nonsense."

Janet Lou raised a chubby, troubled face to that of her older cousin.

"Yes, Mary, dear," she nodded; "indeed I do. I believe in them as hard as can be, for Bridget says that every time a mortal, and especially a child, says there are no fairies, one of the poor little fellows dies 'that quick,'" and she tried to snap her tiny fingers as Bridget had done in telling the story.

"Bridget," said Mary stoutly, "is a poor, ignorant Irish girl brought up on the peat bogs. I heard mother say so. You can't expect her to know the truth about fairies."

"But I love Bridget," protested Jackie, five years old and very serious indeed, rising to his full, plump height in the midst of the buttercups and clover. "She lived in a nice cottage when she was little, with hay on the roof and a big fireplace inside it. She did not live in a peat bog."

Mary laughed a teasing little laugh.

"But," she contradicted, "the cottage was in a peat bog, so there."

While the children talked some one had been approaching them across the field—a tall young woman with golden hair, dressed in soft white. She moved so noiselessly through the swaying grass that she had spoken to the group before they knew she was there.

"Perhaps I can help a little," said the stranger very gently.

The three youngsters turned and regarded her seriously, judging her with the clear eyes of childhood.

Then, "Are there fairies?" asked Mary, and "Aren't there fairies?" asked Jack and Janet Lou, all in a breath.

The golden-haired girl smiled at their strained, unhappy faces.

"Let us all sit down here, inside the ring," she suggested. "It is a rare and beautiful thing to find so perfect a fairy ring as this."

She stepped across the nodding blossoms daintily and sunk among the rich clover.

Mary hesitated, feeling somehow that the newcomer was more foe than friend.

"Please," urged the stranger, "come in and be chummy. Don't stay outside and be lonesome and blue."

Mary crept unwillingly to the edge of the ring, but remained outside it. The girl in white urged her no further, but began to speak very quietly to the three children.

"You see," she said, "the world is full of beautiful things. Nature—the glorious out-of-doors which you three have about you as no city child here, is one of the most beautiful. See these buttercups. The farmer will tell you they are a weed—but do you not think some special grace was given them to grow in this dainty circle? And what reason could there be except to make us poor mortals happy? God has given us the whole wide world to enjoy and to love, just as he has given us each other. Now you know, do you not, that each of us, as well as a body, has something which we call the soul or spirit? It is something which no one can see, but it is the most important, the most lasting part of us. When we die it will live on forever.

"Personally, my theory about fairies is this: Every flower, every blade of grass, every living thing must have its little soul of beauty—its little fairy which lives on and tries to make the world beautiful even after the natural death of the flower or of the grass itself. Fairies to me are the beautiful souls of the countryside and the wood and the garden. One may never see them perhaps, but one may feel them if one sits in a fairy ring or on a green hillside, or wanders through the autumn woods. They must be floating past us on every little breeze and trotting about our feet and perching upon our shoulders, if we are true lovers of nature.

"I think I heard one of you say something a little harsh about Bridget being a poor, ignorant Irish girl. Bridget may be poor and uneducated, and she may have lived in a tiny cottage near a bog, but, my dears, Bridget loves her Ireland, she loves her home cottage, she loves the country where it stood. If she did not, the fairies would not be alive for her."

The golden-haired girl turned to Mary, who had almost entered the ring in her eagerness not to miss a word.

"Only people who shut their eyes to the beauty of nature grow up in the belief that there are no fairies. The soul of the country—the little souls of each buttercup and each daisy and each dancing leaf are living about you, telling you that fairies are not dead—that beauty always lives if your eyes can see it.

The tall girl rose. Little Jackie had fallen asleep with his head against Janet Lou, and Janet Lou was looking relieved but a bit puzzled. As for Mary, however, she stepped into the ring and threw her arms about the stranger's neck.

"Oh, you have made me so happy," she cried. "I understand at last. I don't have to give up my little-girl dreams. I can just come to some grown-up who understands like you do and learn what I don't know. Before, I thought I had to give up the fairies and the dolls and toys and all the things which made me happy, but instead, I see now, something better is waiting for me all the time, as soon as I am big enough and wise enough to understand it."

The Lively Hoop.

One day a little boy named Jasper was out walking with his mother when they came to the window of a toy-shop. There were many toys in the window, but Jasper had eyes only for one, a large, red hoop, the handsomest he had ever seen. The inner side of the hoop was hung with bows of ribbon and small gilt bells; the red hoop-stick had a bow of scarlet ribbon at one end.

"I want that hoop," Jasper said.

Now Jasper was used to having everything he asked for, and so when his mother turned into the shop and bought the hoop he merely grasped it and ran out to the street without a word.

Setting the hoop down on the pavement, he gave it a sharp rap with the stick. Away it rolled, its bells jingling merrily and its ribbons flashing in a blur of bright color. Soon he had left his mother far behind.

"See my new hoop," he shouted, as he passed the boy who sat next to him in school.

"Let me roll it just once," the boy begged, but Jasper shook his head and ran on. The other boy stopped and gazed after him.

Presently Jasper met the little girl who lived next door to him.

"What a beautiful hoop!" she cried. "O, Jasper, do let me roll it just a little way."

"No," said Jasper; "I've only just begun to roll it myself." And he ran swiftly by her with the flashing, jingling hoop.

On and on he went until he had left the city streets behind and was out in the country. As he ran past a green pasture he saw an old horse caught by its mane in a barbed-wire fence. The horse looked at him appealingly.

"If I didn't have to chase this hoop I'd try to untangle your mane, old horse," said Jasper.

With that he gave the hoop another light blow and went running on.

An injured robin was lying on the grass beside the road.

"Help me, little boy," it seemed to cry; "I have hurt my wing, and I greatly fear somebody will step on me."

Jasper felt sorry for the bird, but not sorry enough. He was in a hurry, and so, pretending that he did not understand, he gave the hoop a harder push and went racing on.

As he dashed round a curve in the road the hoop, wheeling gayly before him, ran into an old woman with a basket of vegetables on her head. It frightened her so that she dropped her basket and spilled all the vegetables.

The cabbages and turnips and beets went rolling in every direction.

"Dear, dear!" cried the little old woman. "This is too bad. But then, accidents will happen. Here, boy, help me pick up my stuff."

Jasper, however, was already a dozen rods away. "I can't stop," he called. "I must follow my hoop. Don't you see how it rolls?"

The old woman shaded her eyes with her hand. "Aye, and it shall keep on rolling," she answered. "Roll, hoop!" she cried, lifting up her cracked voice. "Roll, hoop, roll!"

Then how that hoop did roll! Jasper did not have to strike it again; in fact, he had to run with might and main to keep up with it. All by itself it went rolling and rolling, and the farther it went the faster it spun.

"I shall lose it if I can't keep up with it," Jasper thought in dismay; he dared not slacken his pace.

On and on they went, boy and hoop, up hill and down dale.

"Oh, stop a minute," Jasper begged at last. "I must get my breath."

The hoop rolled a little slower at that, but it did not stop. It went on past fields and farm-houses; farmers paused in their ploughing to gaze at the strange sight of a little boy chasing a hoop down a country road.

"Stop, hoop, stop!" Jasper cried at last. "I cannot go any farther until I rest."

As if in answer, the hoop began to roll more slowly. At length it came to a pause beside a fence, and Jasper sank down on the grass.

While he was resting some children came across the field. They looked at the hoop with longing eyes. One of the little girls put out her hand and touched it shyly. "Just once?" she said in a pleading voice.

But Jasper shook his head. "Let that alone; that's my new hoop," he said.

The words were no sooner out of his mouth than the hoop righted itself and, with a flutter of ribbons and a gentle jingle of bells, went rolling away.

Jasper was so astonished that at first he could not move, but presently he scrambled to his feet and went running in pursuit. Travelers on the road were amazed when they met a cloud of dust with a racing boy in the middle of it, and a colored object that seemed to ring as it sped along. Still on and on they went, boy and hoop. At last they came to a place where the road forked; to Jasper's dismay the hoop took the wrong road—the one that did not lead to his home.

"Stop, hoop, stop!" he cried. But his words had no effect.

It was nearly sundown when the runaway hoop slackened its pace before a little white house on the side of the road. It rolled up to a syringa bush at the edge of the yard and there stopped. Jasper sank down on the grass.

A kind-looking woman came to the door of the house. "Come in and rest," she said.

Jasper was so very cross by this time that he had no manners at all; he did not even lift his hat. "I want a drink of water," he said.

At his words the hoop gave a slight jingle and slipped along a little way beside the syringa bush.

"A drink of water, if you please," Jasper said hastily.

The woman gave him a chair and then went into the house and came back with a glass of iced lemonade and a plateful of cookies.

By the time Jasper had finished the last cooky it was nearly dark. The woman questioned him, and when she found that he was far from home, she said, "You'd better put your hoop here on the porch and spend the night."

In the morning she waked him for an early breakfast. "Your mother will be watching for you," she said, as she buttered bread for him and poured out a glass of creamy milk.

Jasper frowned. "I'm not used to getting up before sunrise," he complained.

The words were scarcely out of his mouth when jingle, jingle, jingle! came a sound of light bells, and a flash of gay colors went by the door.

"My hoop!" shouted Jasper. "It is running away again!" He jumped up, nearly kicking the table over in his hurry, and darted out of the door and down the steps with never so much as a thank you or a good-by.

It was the race of yesterday beginning all over again. Jasper ran, and the hoop rolled. Always just a little ahead of him the bright ribbons flashed; again and again, just as his hands almost grasped the rim, there was a jingle of bells, and faster than ever the hoop went on again.

As he followed panting, he thought to himself, "This time when I get hot and tired there will be no kind woman to look after me." Then he added aloud, "I am sorry I forgot to thank her for what she did."

As he said the words the hoop seemed to slacken its pace.

On and on they went until he heard a mournful "Tweet, tweet," in the grass at the side of the road. Looking down, Jasper saw the wounded robin still lying there.

He hesitated a moment and then went over and gently picked the bird up. The poor little creature was weak and gasping. He carried it to a stream that flowed at the side of the road and wet its parched throat with drops of clear, cool water. Then he laid it close beside the trunk of an apple aree in a near-by field.

"I suppose my hoop's gone for good," he thought. But as he returned to the road he saw it leaning peacefully against the fence.

"That's strange," he thought. But before he could touch it, it righted itself again and wheeled smoothly away just ahead of him.

On and on the hoop rolled with Jasper following. After a while they came to the field where Jasper had seen the horse. He was still there, in the same spot, with his mane tightly tangled in the fence, for no one had come to loosen him.

"How could I have left that poor old creature in a fix like that," thought Jasper. He threw his stick down and ran over to the fence. The old horse whinnied feebly.

Jasper had to work hard to untangle the long strands from the sharp barbed wire, but he succeeded at length in setting the prisoner free.

The old horse shook his head and gave him a look of dumb thankfulness, then walked off toward a stream in the middle of the pasture.

When Jasper returned to the road he had forgotten all about his runaway hoop. But there it was, leaning against a large stone by the roadside, as if waiting for him. As before, the instant Jasper started to touch it, the bells jingled, and away it went.

"I don't think I'll ever catch it," Jasper said with a sigh. "It will roll on and on forever."

At a curve in the road he came in sight of the old woman whom he had met the day before. She was seated in the grass with her basket of vegetables beside her. The hoop rolled by her with a merry jingle, but Jasper halted.

He took off his cap shame-facedly. "I'm sorry I made you drop your basket yesterday," he said. "May I help you carry it to town?"

The old woman looked at him sharply. "If you do you may lose your hoop," she reminded him.

But Jasper had already picked up the basket. "It's too heavy for you," he said.

Then a strange thing happened. The old woman rose to her feet and turned. "Stop, hoop, stop!" she called shrilly, and, lo and behold, the fleeing hoop dropped in the road with a loud jingle and stayed there.

"Go and get your property," the old woman said to Jasper with a twinkle in her eye. "I believe you are worthy of it now."

Jasper, wondering very much, ran and picked up the hoop. He half expected it to jump up and dash away before he could grasp it; but that was not the case—it was as quiet and tame as when he had bought it in the shop.

Jasper blinked. "Am I dreaming," thought he, "or did that old woman bewitch my hoop?"

He felt very different somehow. A passing wagon gave the old woman a lift, and Jasper, driving the hoop before him, went running home.

"I'm sure my mother will be anxious about me," he thought. "Roll, hoop, roll!" Eleanor Fairchild Pease.

The Pansy.

There is a good fable told about a king's garden in which all at once the trees and flowers began to pine and make complaint.

The oak was sad because it could not yield flowers; the rosebud was sad because it could not bear fruit; the vine was sad because it had to cling to a wall and could cast no cool shadow.

"We are not of the least use," said they.

Then the king saw a little pansy, which all this time held up its glad, fresh face, while all the rest were sad.

And the king said, "What makes you so fresh and glad, while all the rest pine and are so sad?"

"I thought," said the pansy, "that you wanted me here because you planted me; and so I made up my mind that I would try to be the best little pansy that could be."

We cannot all be wise and great. We cannot all occupy high positions in the world and do great things; but we can all try to be good and do the very best we can in the position in which we have been placed.—The Child's Hour.

The Dandelion Man.

A little green dandelion bud
Grew up and began to unfold;
'Twas a sweet little babe without any hair,
Only a few days old.
But its hair soon grew and hung from its head
In curls of rich mellow gold,
In a broad-brimmed hat of yellow straw,
As big as its head would hold.
But soon its hair was white as wool,
And round like a fleecy ball;
It had grown to a fine old gentleman,
So straight and white and tall.
A few more days and the hair was gone,
But it stood there straight and thin,
A gentleman still, though old and bald,
With whiskers under his chin.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

NORTH DAKOTA.

Rt. Rev. J. P. Tyler, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop attended the meeting of the Council of the Domestic Missionary Bishops in Salt Lake City on September 6, a meeting called to pass upon the budgets of the various missionary districts for 1922. Two days were spent in conferences over this important matter. The Bishop also had the pleasure of spending one day at a session of the Synod of the Province of the Pacific, which convened in Salt Lake City on September 8.

Conference of the Clergy: A well attended, important and interesting conference of the clergy of the district was held in the Cathedral crypt on Thursday, September 15. Much important business was attended to concerning the Nation-Wide Campaign and the Church's Centennial celebration of the Foreign and Domestic Missionary Society.

The Bishop appointed the following as rural deans: The Rev. N. E. Elsworth, dean of the Minot Deanery; the Rev. C. P. Drew, of Bismark; the Rev. D. Pierce-Jones, of Grand Forks, and the Rev. Charles W. Baxter, of Fargo.

The Bishop and Mrs. Tyler, Mrs. Grime, and the Rev. Messrs. D. J. Gallagher, C. P. Drew and N. E. Elsworth represented the district at the session of the Synod of the Province of the Northwest, held in Denver September 25 to 28.

The Rev. Jonathan Watson, D. D., after a pleasant sojourn at his old home in Scotland and in England, has returned to his home and duties at Grand Forks.

Archdeacon Martyr has also returned to his manifold duties in the district after a pleasant vacation spent in Engalnd.

The Rev. D. Pierce-Jones is holding a conference in the interest of the Nation-Wide Campaign at St. Peter's, Park River, with delegates from Lakota, Langdon and other near-by places, being helped in this conference by the Rev. Charles Leo Abbott and the Rev. H. Garfield Walker.

MICHIGAN.

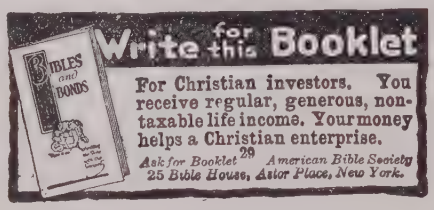
Rt. Rev. Chas. D. Williams, D. D., Bishop

Lay Readers Set Apart at Impressive Service in St. Paul's Cathedral.

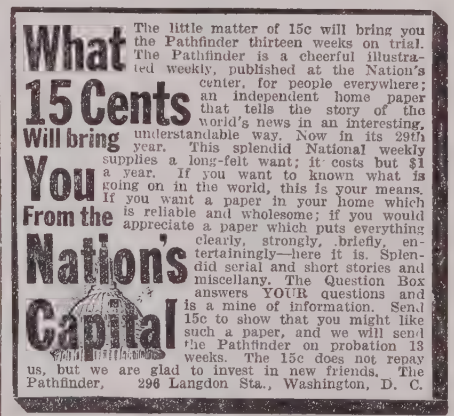
Following the custom of a special order of lay preachers observed by the Church of England, the Rt. Rev. Charles D. Williams, Bishop of Michigan, set apart fifteen laymen to be lay readers in the Diocese at an impressive service at St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, Sunday evening, October 9. The Bishop preached on the subject, "The Call to the Ministry," and he was assisted at the service by the Very Rev. Warren L. Rogers, dean of the Cathedral, and the Ven. Messrs. H. K. Bartow, C. L. Ramsay and E. B. Jermin, the three Archdeacons of the Diocese.

After the ceremony of setting apart, which was witnessed by a large congregation, including large delegations from the Diocesan Brotherhood of St. Andrew and the Episcopal Young People's Association, Bishop Williams presented each of the lay readers with a silver cross on a purple ribbon, which will be worn as a badge of office. The men will be used in various missions and churches, especially in the neighborhood of Detroit, which are at present without the services of regularly ordained clergy.

The men set apart have been following a four months' course of study and practice in preaching under the direction of a faculty composed of several clergymen of the Diocese.



Nation-Wide Campaign Conferences.



Educational parish conferences driving home the facts of the Nation-Wide Campaign are being arranged throughout the Diocese, and after a month of preparation the conferences in every church in the Diocese will be undertaken by a picked squadron of clergy and laymen.

Meetings of the three Archdeaconries of the Diocese were held the last week in September, at which the plans for the conferences were explained to delegates and co-operation for the movement was secured. The Rt. Rev. Charles D. Williams, Bishop of Michigan; the Rev. J. A. Ten Broeck, of the Nation-Wide Campaign Department of the Presiding Bishop and Council; the Rev. E. J. M. Nutter, rector of the Messiah Church, Detroit, and Charles O. Ford, Executive Secretary of the Diocese, were present at all meetings and outlined the plans which will be followed.

It is expected that the conferences, which are to be of three days' duration in each parish, will get under way about the first of November.

SOUTHERN OHIO.

Rt. Rev. Boyd Vincent, D. D., Bishop.

Fiftieth Anniversary of St. Philip's, Cincinnati.

St. Philip's, Northside, Cincinnati, is to celebrate its fiftieth anniversary with a fine program Sunday, October 30. Bishop Vincent, of the Diocese, and Bishop Hunting, of Nevada, will preach. November 1 the pageant, "Send Out Thy Light," will be given. November 4 will be a parish social and home-coming, with Bishop Reese, Coadjutor of the Diocese, and other clergy present. November 6 a week's preaching mission, with the Rev. Gilbert P. Symons, of Glendale, as missioner, will begin.

The Rev. Frank E. Cooley, after eighteen years of devoted service as rector of Madisonville, Cincinnati, has resigned to take at least six months' much-needed rest. During his rectorate the church has become an independent parish, a parish house has been built and a rectory purchased. Mr. Cooley will retain his duty as missionary in charge of St. Mark's, Oakley, and also as a worker on the staff of the Cincinnati City Mission, where his ministrations are most acceptable. He is fifth on the list of presbyters in active service in this Diocese.

PITTSBURGH

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop

Bishop Overs' Visit.

The Rt. Rev. Walter H. Overs, Bishop of Liberia, spent the week-end, including Sunday, October 9, in Pittsburgh. On Thursday morning he addressed a large gathering of the Diocesan Woman's Auxiliary at St. Peter's Parish House, and also spoke to several parochial branches of the Auxiliary. On Saturday Bishop and Mrs. Whitehead gave a reception for Bishop Overs in the Parish House of the Church of the Ascension, at which the Bishop spoke. On Sunday, in the morning, he preached at St. Stephen's Church, Wilkinsburg; in the afternoon at the Church of the Holy Cross, Pittsburgh, and in the evening at Calvary Church, Pittsburgh.

The Laymen's Missionary League had a dinner on Wednesday, October 5, at St. Peter's Parish House, Pittsburgh. A meeting followed, at which Bishop Whitehead presided, and plans were discussed and arrangements perfected for the winter's work. At present the League is supplying services at six points in the city and suburbs; and taking occasional services in vacant mission churches. The president of the League is Mrs. N. P. Hyndman.

A dinner was given recently in Calvary Parish House, under the auspices of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education, to welcome to the Diocese the new Superintendent of Religious Education, Miss Charlotte Forsyth, and to receive various reports. Invitations were sent to the clergy, the superintendents and assistant superintendents of the various Sunday schools, and there was a large and representative attendance. The Rev. R. N. Meade, chairman of the Board, presided; Bishop Whitehead was present, and the occasion was a pleasant and profitable one.

N.-W. C. Conference.

At the autumnal meeting of the Piedmont Convocation four centers were chosen for inaugurating the Nation-Wide Campaign—Culpeper, The Plains, Alexandria and Leesburg.

October 4 the meeting was held in St. Stephen's Culpeper, for the five parishes in this part of the Convocation, and every one was represented.

After a brief service of worship, led by the Rev. Dr. Hammond, the rector, the Rev. G. McL. Brydon, outlined the purpose and plan of the campaign. Conferences were then opened, he conducting that for the men, and Mrs. H. F. Grant, of Charlottesville, and Miss Pickett Waller, of Widewater, took charge of the conference for the women.

The delegates were welcomed to the homes of the people of St. Stephen's for lunch, and the afternoon meeting was similar to the morning one, ending in a service of Intercession, conducted by Mr. Brydon.

Recent Bequests: By the will of Mrs. Ellen R. Palmer, a communicant of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, who died recently, the following bequests to Church and charitable institutions in Richmond have been announced: Home for Incurables, $10,000; Sheltering Arms Hospital, $10,000; Old Folks' Home for Colored People, $5,000; Society, Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, $2,000; St. Paul's Church, $1,000; Protestant Episcopal Church Home, $500.

WEST VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Coadjutor.

Death of Dr. G. A. Aschman.

On Sunday, October 2, Dr. G. A. Aschman, a well-known layman of Wheeling, W. Va., died after an illness of two months and a half. In July he underwent a severe surgical operation, after which he gradually grew weaker. Uraemia set in, and the end came at his home in Woodlawn precisely at the hour prayers were being offered for him at the morning service in St. Matthew's Church.

In his death the Church sustains a heavy loss. For over thirty years actively identified with all departments of the Church work, he had served as Senior Warden of St. Matthew's Parish since 1898. He represented his parish in twenty-five diocesan conventions, and his Diocese in eight consecutive General Conventions. Dr. Aschman was educated in Europe, graduating with classical honors from the University of Geneva. He was also eminent in the medical profession, having specialized in diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat. Funeral services were conducted from St. Matthew's Church, Wheeling, Wednesday afternoon, October 5.

Personal Notes

The address of the Rt. Rev. Troy Beatty, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Tennessee, has been changed to the Albemarle Apartments, Nashville, Tenn. Correspondents will please make the necessary change in their clergy list.

The Rev. D. Campbell Mayers has resigned the charge of Greenwood Parish, Albemarle County, Va., and accepted a call to Johns Parish, Loudoun County, including the churches at Aldie, Middleburg and Oatlands, Va.

The Rev. Harry L. Chowins has been assigned to the work on Olathe, and as associate with the Rev. Carl Nau, Kansas City, Kan.

The Rev. Lester L. Riley has accepted the rectorship of St. Peter's Church, Pittsburgh, Pa., and is already at work in his new field.

The Rev. P. P. Philips, formerly rector of St. Paul's Church, Alexandria, has been engaged to take temporary charge of the work of St. John's Church, Georgetown, D. C., until a new rector is chosen to fill the place made vacant by the resignation of Rev. C. P. Sparling. Mr. Sparling has accepted the call to the Church of "The Prince of Peace," Walbrook, near Baltimore, and assumed active duties on October 15.

The Rev. Douglas Matthews has resigned as rector at Junction City, Kan., and accepted a call to Billings, Mon.

The Rev. H. K. Pendleton, of Spartanburg, S .C., has been called to St. Paul's Church, Charleston, to take the place of Rev. Mercer P. Logan, who has accepted a position at Monteagle, Tenn., as warden o fthe DuBose Memorial School.

The Rev. William S. Shacklette, rector of Weddell Memorial Church, Richmond, Va., has resigned to accept the rectorship of Rivanna Parish, Fluvana County, Va., and will go into residence at Columbia on November 1.

All communications intended for the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Western Michigan should be addressed to the Rev. Wilfred A. Munday, Secretary, 907 Turner Avenue, Grand Rapids, Mich.

The Rev. Howard W. Mills has accepted the call to the work in Chautauqua County, which includes the centers at Elgin, Sedan and Cedarvale, Kan.

The Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., warden of the DuBose Memorial Church Training School, Monteagle, Tenn., and Miss Eliza Huger Dunkin were married in St. Paul's Church, Radcliffeboro, Charleston, S. C., on September 14, 1921, by the Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D.

The Rev. Charles W. Baxter, lately of New Ulm, Minn., has accepted a call to All Saints' Parish, Valley City, N. D., and with Mrs. Baxter and their little girl are established in the rectory there.

The Rev. Charles R. Barnes, rector of St. John's, South Williamsport, Pa., has accepted an appointment as rector's assistant of Christ Church, Williamsport, effective October 6.

Mr. E. E. Piper, for some time past connected with the Educational Department of the Presiding Bishop and Council in New York City, has accepted the position of Superintendent of Religious Education for the Diocese of Michigan, and has just entered upon his new work. Prior to going to New York, Mr. Piper was connected with the Ypsilanti Normal College at Ypsilanti, Mich.

The Rev. C. G. Fox and his family, of Valley City, N. D., left on September 1 for their new home in Sedalia, Mo.

The Mayor of Schenectady, N. Y., has appointed the Rev. Dr. B. W. R. Tayler, rector of St. George's Church, to be the chairman of a civic committee of one hundred to deal with the problem of unemployment. Schenectady is a large industrial city of one hundred thousand people, and the problem is naturally acute. Dr. Tayler is also the president of the Park Board of that city, and has been largely instrumental in the development of its splendid system of public parks and playgrounds.

Ordinations.

Mr. Belvo Z. Stambaugh, for the past ten months on the staff of St. Paul's Cathedral as a lay reader, was ordained to the diaconate Sunday, October 2, at the Cathedral by the Rt. Rev. Charles D. Williams, Bishop of Michigan. Mr. Stambaugh was formerly minister of the Congregational Church at Marlborough, Mass., which pastorate he left to become a candidate for Holy Orders in the Episcopal Church. In addition to his work at the Cathedral, Mr. Stambaugh has also been in charge of the Emmanuel Mission, which was recently started under the direction of the Reinforcement Fund Committee of the Diocesan Church Club. The presenter at the service was Archdeacon H. K. Bartow, and the sermon was preached by the Very Rev. Warren L. Rogers, Dean of the Cathedral.

An Idea Originated by this Cleveland Church Society is Spreading Like Wild Fire

HOW IT HAPPENED

SOME one conceived the idea that Candy Mints would be easy to sell, and every one seemed to agree, so a committee was appointed to call on Strong, Cobb & Company, Cleveland, O., a large manufacturing concern, who were the first in the country to make Mints.

The outcome of this interview resulted in the Company agreeing to get up a special package called "22 Mints," which contained 320 5-cent rolls that cost $9.00 and sell for $16.00, making $7.00 profit. Four Flavors, Peppermint, Wintergreen, Cinnamon, and Clove. Packed 80 packages to a box, four boxes to a case.

The sale has proven so easy and successful, and so much enthusiasm has been created by one telling another, that the Company is now filling orders for "22 Mints" from all parts of the country. Here are extracts from some of the letters received.

HOW IT WORKS

Miss Mary E. Orr, 2007 Garrard Ave., Covington, Ky., says: "Enclosed find money order for $9.00. Please send as soon as possible one case of '22 Mints.' I am ordering these for our Young Woman's Society of our church. We have already sold two cases."

Dr. E. L. Chapman, D. O., 1017 Jackson St., Anderson, Ind., says: "Our girls are delighted with the '22 Mints.' They sell fine."

Miss Lillian Caldwell, Freedom School, Alliance, O., says: "Enclosed find order for three cases of '22 Mints.' Please rush this order, as we are having many calls for more candy."

Mrs. Jessie Meverdere, Sturgeon Bay, Wis., says: "Please send another order of Mints. Only had the other case a week, and they are nearly all gone."

Mrs. L. F. Johnson, Corresponding Secretary W. C. T. U., Erie, Pa., says: "The Mints sold like hot cakes and are fine. Have recommended same to others."

Your society can do the same. Send $9.00 now for a case of "22 Mints" and they will be sent prepaid express or parcel post

The YOUTH'S COMPANION

THE COMPANION is unique in its reader-serving, home-serving, community-serving power. It is vastly more than reading. It is a friend and inspirer and an entertainer also. It tells how to do things—how to earn—how to save. It helps every interest of everyone in the family.

SERIALS, SHORT STORIES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, POETRY, NATURE AND SCIENCE, CURRENT EVENTS, DOCTOR'S CORNER, RECEIPTS.

STAMPS TO STICK, GAMES, SPORTS, PUZZLES, "HOW-TO-MAKE" PAGES, SUGGESTIONS FOR HOME EFFICIENCY AND ECONOMY.

". . . Let me tell you before closing just how much our whole family does enjoy The Companion," writes a subscriber. "Father, mother and the boys all find something of interest in each copy. I thot I was doing the lad who asked me for my subscription a favor when I subscribed. I found that he was doing our whole family one instead."

The Companion cements the Family; the Family cements the Nation

The Companion is one of the strongest forces for making America a land to love and to serve with loyalty. Every page reflects ideals—ideals for the boy and the girl, ideals for the parents in their relations with each other and their children and the world. It is a constant stimulant to high thinking, to clean living, to patriotism.

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., OCTOBER 29, 1921. No. 44.

THE CATHEDRALS OF TODAY.

The most interesting and illuminating article written by Dean Robbins at our request for the Southern Churchman, which we publish today, gives such a conception of the function of a modern cathedral as may well cause many readers to recast their opinions. There is a widespread idea that cathedrals are nothing but an extravagant form of ecclesiastical ostentation. "For what purpose was this waste?" men say, as they read of the great sums which cathedrals cost. Why was not this money given to the poor, or to missions, or to some other work which plainly helps people who need help?

As against questions such as these, Dean Robbins presents the constructive defense of the cathedral's function. We believe there is the power of truth in what he says. "The popularity of true cathedrals was much in evidence in the great age of cathedral building. The people built them, and the people loved them and frequented them. * * * The cathedral" (as conceived in New York now), "is a house of prayer for all people. The rich and the poor meet here without distinction or respect of persons. Strangers from every part of the country, from every part of the world, take their places beside citizens of New York, and do not feel that they are trespassing. Men who have not been inside a church for years—some of them could not be persuaded to enter any church other than a cathedral—enter upon the same terms as habitual church-goers. Young people, many of whom are more or less out of touch with conventional religion, make an exception in the case of the cathedral; its greatness and impersonality attract them. Working people come, because the cathedral is not associated in their minds with privilege and discrimination. The congregations are always differently composed—only a few people, relatively speaking, come with regularity—and it is estimated that more than a million different persons have attended services at the cathedral during the past decade. If it had no other distinctive function, this fact alone would justify the erection and maintenance of it. In every populous American city there should be one church which is known to be without question a house of prayer for all sorts and conditions of men, a people's church, great, democratic, welcoming and free."

It is a fact that in most of our communities there is no church which stands as a symbol of the unity of aspiration of all people. Our parish churches are identified with particular congregations—their interests, their possession. However hospitable they may be, they cannot quite lift the appeal of the Church up above all personalities of a little group. They may embody all that is most beautiful in a specific fellowship; but they cannot symbolize the grandeur and the unity of the Church, which is larger than the churches and the congregations.

Toward the glory of this inclusive symbolism the Cathedral of St. John the Divine aspires. As Dean Robbins describes it, with its doors open to all people, with the constant ministry of its chapels to many racial groups, with the welcome of its mighty spaces to great community expressions of thanksgiving or appeal, we believe that the cathedral—builded there on Morningside Heights, or with similar ideals in any other great city—may help to make articulate the spiritual yearnings of great multitudes who now are dumb. We do not fear that the building of such cathedrals will subtract money from our missionary enterprises, any more than we fear that missionary enterprises will subtract money from our work at home. If a great work is so conceived that it truly sets forth the glory of God, its support will be drawn not from other benefactions, but from the selfish waste of worldly things which uninspired lives are guilty of. There is wealth enough in the Church for philanthropy and for missions, and for cathedrals, too; and it is possible that the creation of the cathedrals may call forth, as nothing else might do, the love of beauty and the poetry of worship without which the image of God is blurred in human souls.

A BATTLE AGAINST A GREAT SCOURGE.

If the Master made it one of the supreme marks of loyalty to Him that we should visit the sick, surely He would count it also an act of Christian discipleship that we should do our utmost always to prevent the sicknesses from which men suffer.

Therefore, with full knowledge of the instinctive shrinking of most people's minds from the unhappy suggestions of disease, we set before our readers to-day the appeal of the American Society for the Control of Cancer for cooperation in its nation-wide campaign of education.

Cancer is one of the unsolved problems of medicine. The most diligent and unflagging study of the keenest investigators has been thus far baffled in discovering its cause.

Nobody in the world knows why a particular individual contracts cancer and another does not. Yet enough is known about it in the way of treatment and cure to make the difference between life and death for thousands of individuals if this knowledge is widely spread.

It is to spread this knowledge that the American Society for the Control of Cancer will conduct its educational campaign. Its purpose is to reach all the men and women of the nation, through newspapers, through churches, through clinics and every other means of publicity, with the facts they need to know.

This is the essential message:

In the first place, it is believed that cancer is probably not hereditary, and certainly not contagious. The fact that some member of one family has had it does not seem to make the chance noticeably greater that another will have it; nor, on the other hand, does the fact that the family history is free from it make any individual surely immune.

In the second place, the most effective cure known for cancer is surgery. Radium is helpful in some cases, but the quack remedies sometimes advertised are a deadly danger to the ignorant and gullible. The prompt removal of a cancerous growth is usually the one remedy that can be trusted.

In the third place, cancer is far more often cured than is usually believed. Many persons go to the hospitals to be operated on for cancer, who, because of their dread of the disease, do not let it be known, even among their friends, what the trouble is. They are operated on and cured, and the public generally never knows that this was a case of cancer. On the other hand, those cases which turn out to be fatal, by the long and lingering character of the illness, advertise themselves, so that people in general have the impression that cancer practically always means inevitable doom. As a matter of fact, many of the most experienced surgeons believe that 50 per cent. of cases of cancer which now come to the physician are cured, and are certain that this percentage could be made very much greater if all cases could be treated early.

In the fourth place, the vital necessity is early diagnosis. If a surgeon is able to operate soon enough, cancer can almost always be cured. Therefore, the campaign of education to be undertaken by the American Society for the Control of Cancer is meant to secure this chance for early diagnosis.

The one great message and objective is that through these weeks of publicity, culminating with the first week in November, when free clinics will be established all over America, all persons who have any suspicious growth or unusual internal symptoms should be able to find out the truth about themselves.

On the other hand, the great desire of the American Society in this campaign is to avoid foolish alarm and the kind of ignorance that plays into the hands of unscrupulous medical quacks. A short while ago a young man came in from the country to see a surgeon because he suspected he had a cancerous growth. On the train some one told him of a cancer hospital which advertised a cure by a secret process. He went to the hospital. The man in charge looked at him, as the country boy said, through a telescope, declared he had cancer, and that he could be cured for $200. The boy did not have the $200, so he went to the surgeon whom he had first intended to consult and asked him to lend him the $200 so that he could go to the cancer hospital. The surgeon looked at him, found that he had nothing but an ordinary wart, took a pair of surgical scissors, cut it off, dressed the place, and told the boy to go home and forget it.

Between two mistakes, therefore, the lack of careful attention and awareness which may let dangerous conditions develop until it is too late, and on the other hand, the credulity which plays into the hands of charlitans, the campaign for education is trying to steer. Its goal is to get all persons who have any possible likelihood of a cancer to consult their family physician or a reputable surgeon, so that they may be reassured if nothing is wrong, and treated successfully if there is danger.

What the readers of this paper can do is to listen to this message, to call the attention of others to it, and to co-operate with local physicians in winning the attention of their communities to the lectures and free clinics which will be held in the week from October 30 to November 6.

"I BELIEVE IN THE COMMUNION OF SAINTS."

A correspondent asks us to write something on the Communion of Saints. She thinks a great deal about it, now that so many loved ones have been called away, but is not sure that she quite understands what it means. Few of us do, indeed, or shall fully "until the shadows flee away."

The phrase takes us at once to the Apostles' Creed. There are twelve "articles of the Christian Faith, as contained in the Apostles' Creed," and the same in the Nicene Creed. When correctly punctuated each article ends with a colon or a period, never with a comma or semi-colon, and they may be so distinguished. The ninth article is "(I believe in) the Holy Catholic Church; the Communion of saints:."

The latter clause, we are told, is a somewhat later addition to the article. It defines and explains the leading clause and both enlarges and spiritualizes our conception of the Church which might easily become narrow and earth-bound. We think of the Church as this or that as we regard one or another of its parts or its characteristics. But the Church is the whole Communion of Saints—no less. It is the whole body of dedicated souls (saints) who have commonplace participation in the spiritual life in Christ Jesus through the operation of the Holy Ghost. In whatever words it may be stated, this is the essential concept of the Church and includes both its holiness and its catholicity.

The two particular facts here emphasized are, first; the Church embraces all the saints; those who are at any given moment in the flesh upon earth and the far greater multitude who are with Christ in Paradise. Secondly; there is an abiding communion and fellowship of all the saints, not only with Christ their common head, but with one another in the common sphere or element of spiritual life and blessedness.

It is at this point, we think, that the full significance of this very comfortable doctrine eludes our apprehension and so fails to satisfy.

All Saints.

They walk in white; their feet tread paths of gold;
They hunger not, they feel not pain nor cold;
They breathe new life, and never shall grow old.

But we go halt, by reason of their loss;
Our fires burn low, our hoarded gold is dross;
And every soul upbears a secret cross.

Yet as they press toward heaven's highest sphere,
And shine in light reflected, radiant, clear,
They are not distant from us, but most near.

For He Whose grace does all their bliss bestow—
His heart has felt the thrust of human woe!
He is our Brother, Jesus, Whom we know.

And walking with Him, with new-opened eyes,
We may discern how all about us lies,
Thronged with His saints, the shore of Paradise.

—M. L. G.

We think little about it until there comes a time when the pain of prolonged separation from loved ones departed is heavy upon us. Then we fondly feel that the Communion of Saints, if it means anything real, ought to involve some sensible means of communication between them and ourselves; for this is what we long for in our loneliness and grief. But such communications through physical media are nowhere promised us, they are not implied in this doctrine, and human experience forbids us to expect them. Many reasons based on the limitations of our human condition could be given for this, but the best reason is that it is not the will of our heavenly Father, who is Wisdom and Love, that it should be so. Still the Communion of Saints is a very real fact, and full of comfort to the bereaved heart.

Long separations, with all their disquietudes, occur in this life to persons knit together in the closest bonds of intimacy and affection. But in this case pain and regret is mitigated by the assurance that we shall hear from our absent ones frequently, and the letters that come and go at regular intervals keep the intimacy fresh and the affections quick and responsive. It is largely this that we so greatly miss and long for when our loved ones have gone to that other country with which, whether it be far or near, we can have no communication by mail or wire. We want to know something of their state and how they do, of their occupations and surroundings, whether they are happy in their new life and remember us with unchanging affection.

Even those who imagine that communications do come from the unseen world to persons of a certain temperament recognize the difficulty of describing spiritual things and experiences in human language which is so largely limited to things physical and tangible. The Bible writers wrestled with this difficulty and only solved it in part by spiritualizing certain material concepts to which our minds are hospitable. Heaven, love, redemption, the heart, are examples. Even if our departed friends could communicate directly with us, they would have to use Bible language, words to which we have learned to give a spiritual meaning, in order to convey their message; and what they could or would say we have already in the message of Christ the Revealer. Do they love us still with the old and beautiful affection? The doctrine of the Communion of Saints assures us that they do, "for love is of God," and unchangeable except to grow more and more. Are they happy, and is it well with them? "In Thy presence is fulness of joy—pleasures forevermore." What are they doing? Ah! what are you doing when you are nearest to Christ and enjoying most the consciousness of His presence and blessing? Communing with Him, serving Him, receiving His peace and joy and "growing up unto Him," loving God and man, are you not? And that is what they are doing in every moment, in every thought and act. We doubt whether, even if they could communicate with us face to face, they could tell us more than this. We would still "see through a glass, darkly." But all this we hope because "we believe in the Communion, the fellowship, the common participation, of the Saints" in the Life and Love of God through Jesus Christ.

Correction: The reverend author of the "Centenary Hymn" published in our issue of October 1, requests us to correct a misprint in verse four, and of line two, where for "surprise" read "emprise." Important, since the hymn was written to be sung, and we must "sing with the understanding also."

In the same issue the title of the beautiful lines on the first page, "Rabboni," was horribly misspelled.

A curious thing, the perversity of these typographical errors. A printer sits at his linotype machine to set up an article, and out of every two thousand chances, let us say, to misread his "copy" or to strike the wrong key he will make one error. An expert proofreader scans his work with minute attention and notes ninety-nine per cent. of the mistakes therein. A corrected proof is sent to the editorial office, where it is again read most carefully, and ninety-nine per cent. of the mistakes which may still remain concealed are detected and exposed. Then the printer does his final best, thousands of copies are printed and rushed to the mail, and lo! some perfectly patent misprint stares at the reader from the fair page in all its naked deformity! Perhaps the copy was blurred just here; perhaps the attention of the lynx-eyed proofreader wavered for half an instant; perhaps the printer overlooked one correction on his proofsheet; or perhaps in resetting a line to correct one error he made another. But the proofreader, the editor, and finally the author gnash their teeth in vain. However it happened, the thing is there:

"— Nor all your piety and wit
Can call it back to cancel half a line,
Nor all your tears wash out a word of it."

THE CALL TO REPENTANCE.

"In all the length and breadth of this and other lands, there is not a voice from any Christian pulpit that shows power to draw men to their knees in penitence." This is a magazine's statement, not mine, but in it I see a sad commentary of what is deep down in the hearts of many people today, faulting the Church, and that because of political conditions. Had this country stood up at the conference of the allies and placed Jesus Christ as the one power to unite the world; and had those potentates bowed to Him, what a different condition we might have! But, inasmuch as the outlook is dark through no fault of the Church leaders, it is now the duty of the pulpit to bring men to repentance—then we shall be able to appreciate the lines of Rudyard Kipling:

"The tumult and the shouting dies,
The captains and the kings depart,
Still stands God's ancient sacrifice,
An humble and contrite heart.
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget."
—From Convention Address of Bishop Winchester.

I came from God, and I'm going back to God, and I shall not have any gaps of death in the middle of my life.
—George McDonald.

THE HOLY SPIRIT, THE COMFORTER.

Some of us think of comfort only on its physical side, the ease of slippers and arm-chair, mere "creature comforts," as they are called. Some look at Christ and His Church only in that way.

Or some, when trouble comes that reaches deeper than the body, long for comfort, and what they want is to lean, to lay off their burden upon some sympathizing friend.

But the word itself means, co-strength, co-operation by the impartation of strength. The Comforter, the Holy Spirit, promised us by Christ, is called the Paraclete, the Cheerer, the Encourager, the Strengthener—not the Substitute, the Scape-goat upon whom we unload. He comes into us to enable us to bear, to fit our backs for the burden, not to take it off.

And so our truest help to our friends is not to make them comfortable, is not to relieve them, but is to add our strength to theirs, to cheer and to encourage them. That is true comfort.—The Good News.

Southern Baptist Churches report for the past year an increase of more than 50,000 in baptisms over the year previous, and a gain of more than two thousand new congregations. Contributions for benevolences showed a gain of nearly 100 per cent., reaching a total of over $14,000,000, and contributions for all purposes a gain of over 61 per cent., the total being $34,880,000. A gain of 2,700 Sunday schools and 130,000 Sunday school scholars is also reported.

SOME OF THE FUNCTIONS OF A MODERN CATHEDRAL

By the Very Rev. Howard C. Robbins, D. D., Dean of the Cathedral of John the Divine.

PROFESSOR Sumner used to tell his classes in sociology that no great human institution ever gets away from its roots. If there is vitality enough in the organism to ensure survival, there will also be found in it a principle of continuity, making for conformity to type.

According to this doctrine, it may be expected that a modern cathedral will conform to type, and exhibit familiar characteristics. It will differ from other churches not only in its dimensions, but also and chiefly in its functions. It will be In a peculiar and distinctive sense the church of the people, a church in which the whole community possesses and is conscious of possessing proprietary rights.

This popularity of true cathedrals was much in evidence in the great age of cathedral building. The people built them, and the people loved them and frequented them. Generally speaking, they were erected by means of voluntary contributions solicited from all classes and conditions, the rich and poor alike. Those who could not give money gave their labor. Young men and maidens, old men and children, brought what they were able to bring, timbers for construction, pigments for decoration, linen and laces, tapestries and embroideries for furnishings. The churches which the people built became the most valued possession of the people. They were used for secular as well as for religious purposes, and became centres of civil as well as of religious life. The building of them synchronized with the great movement for communal autonomy in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, and the cathedrals were the outward and visible expression of new and liberating forces of the human spirit.

Among the incorporators of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York there was one to whom this popular and democratic character of the true cathedral appealed so strongly that he expressed himself upon the subject with fiery earnestness. "In no visible form of expression," said Henry Codman Potter, "has habitual disregard of the teachings of the Founder of Christianity been more conspicuously evidenced than in connection with places of worship. These have all along borne their witness to the law, not of inclusion, but of exclusion. Reserved rights in God's house for kings, governors, peers, plutocrats, privileged people of many kinds, but of one unbrotherly temper, have encroached upon the temple of Him who declared in the beginning, 'All ye are brethren,' until, as the consummate blossom of the whole business, we have the modern pew system. Well, in one cathedral, at any rate, there will be no pews, no locked doors, no prepayment for sittings, no reserved rights of caste and rank, but one and the same welcome for all."

The spirit of democracy, voiced by Bishop Potter, had already found expression in the most important provision of the charter. Section 5 reads, "The seats for the worshippers in said Cathedral Church shall always be free." Free they have been, and all men know that they are free, and that the cathedral is a house of prayer for all people. The rich and the poor meet there without distinction or respect of persons. Strangers from every part of the country, from every part of the world, take their places beside citizens of New York, and do not feel that they are trespassing. Men who have not been inside a church for years—some of them could not be persuaded to enter any church other than a cathedral—enter upon the same terms as habitual church-goers. Young people, many of whom are more or less out of touch with conventional religion, make an exception in the case of the cathedral: its greatness and impersonality attract them. Working people come, because the cathedral is not associated in their minds with privilege and discrimination. The congregations are always differently composed—only a few people, relatively speaking, come with regularity—and it is estimated that more than a million different persons have attended services at the cathedral during the past decade. If it had no other distinctive function, this fact alone would justify the erection and maintenance of it. In every populous American city there should be one church which is known to be without question a house of prayer for all sorts and conditions of men, a people's church, great, democratic, welcoming and free.

In one respect, conditions in New York are unique, and have opened to the cathedral a ministry which could scarcely be exercised by any other church, a ministry to various ethnic groups which are included in the extraordinary cosmopolitan population of the city. Services are held in foreign languages, as occasion for them arises. Many services are held in Italian and in Spanish; the Holy Communion is celebrated once a month in Chinese; occasional services are held in Armenian, Japanese, Swedish and Welsh. On Kossovo Day a Serbian archimandrite celebrated the liturgy of the Holy Orthodox Church at the high altar of the cathedral, and a choir composed of Russians and of Jugo-Slavs made the responses. At a service commemorating the ninth anniversary of the establishment of the Chinese Republic, more than six hundred Chinese were present in the congregation, and sang their national anthem in their own tongue. The first lesson was read in Chinese, and a baby who had been dozing through our unintelligible English woke up and began to crow. These occasional services are of value. They are indicative of American sympathy with the stranger within our gates, and often the sympathy is most gratefully acknowledged. Echoes of appreciation come from far-off corners of the world.

The fact has already been noted that in the great age of cathedral building, cathedrals possessed civic and political as well as religious significance. In relating these two fundamental interests, in providing them with a meeting place, and in exerting influences which uplift and ennoble patriotism and make religion practical and politically effective, a cathedral is exercising one of its most characteristic and important functions. A true cathedral is in a peculiar sense the city's church. The strong currents of civic life flow into it, and receive spiritual interpreta-

ROFESSAR Sumner used to tell his classes in sociology tively: it becomes the religious centre of the city's life; the meeting place of patriotism and religion.

During the war the Cathedral of St. John the Divine found wide open to it the opportunity to exercise this kind of ministry. The great experience through which the nation was passing inevitably affected the services, and found reflection in them. Soldiers were present in numbers in almost every congregation, most of them on their way to the front, and at communion services it was very moving to see them coming to the communion rail, sometimes unaccompanied, often with sweetheart, wife, mother or sister, to receive the sacrament for the last time, perhaps, on native soil. By and by the casualty lists began to come in and the services of Godspeed to outgoing armies began to give place to solemn memorial services for the dead. One of these was for former members of the Seventh Regiment of the New York National Guards and o the One Hundred and Seventh United States Infantry ,who gave their lives in the war. Most of these men had fallen in an action which proved to be one of the turning points of the war, the breaking of the Hindenburg line between Cambrai and St. Quentin. The Cathedral was packed to the doors with the immediate relatives of the men who had fallen. There was no room even for the older members of the famous regiment who had come to do honor to their young comrades. They were drawn up on the foundations of the nave outside.

Here, too, after the signing of the armistice, thanksgiving services were held of such a character that place for them could not be found except in a cathedral. The Diocese of New York held here its corporate thanksgiving, and Mr. Elihu Root, in memorable words, characterized the tremendous event which had just occurred. "Into it," he said, "were gathered the developments of a thousand years of the struggle for human freedom. Into it were gathered the lessons of all the sacrifice and struggle —all the strength of moral fibre gained in the high pathway of advancing civilization. From it will flow consequences that we cannot begin to see, for it ushers in the dawn of a new era." Within a week some of these consequences of the signing of the armistice were foreshadowed in the Cathedral. The representatives of the twelve liberated nationalities comprised in the Mid-European Democratic Alliance met there for their thanksgiving service. They brought with them the constitution to which they had just subscribed in Independence Hall, Philadelphia; they brought their flags and banners, new flags, some of them, which had never been carried into a church before. Albanians, Armenians, Czecho-Slovaks, Jugo-Slavs, Lithuanians, Poles, Ukrainians, Zionists—it was like witnessing the christening of nations to see them enter the Cathedral. Thousands outside who could not gain admittance stood bare-headed, some of them with tears in their eyes, as the flags of new-won liberty went by. A few days later there was held in the same place what Bishop Lloyd characterized as the greatest service ever held in America, a thanksgiving service in which every one of the nations which had borne arms in the struggle for liberty, or had declared its sympathies by severing diplomatic relations with the Central Powers, was officially represented. The flags of twenty-seven nations were carried into the chancel and massed there for the singing of the Solemn Te Deum. Such services belong uniquely to a cathedral. No parish church, however commodious, can fulfil quite the same function. Only a cathedral can so transcend denominational limitations that it affords a centre of unity, a place where men can meet on the basis of the things that unite them, and without thought of the things that divide.

The Cathedral of St. John the Divine is not parochially organized. It is difficult to see how it could be organized parochially and yet continue to function as a cathedral. All must have their share in it, or it cannot do what it is uniquely qualified to do. If it were organized as a parish church, in which a regular congregation possesses recognized rights, it could not exercise its larger ministry. It could not dispossess the regular congregation, time after time, for special services, so that now a company of letter-carriers, now a guild of artists or of actors, now a Masonic Grand Lodge, now a thousand seamen, now a great throng of singing children, now a Diocese welcoming its Bishop, now a regiment of soldiers honoring comrades fallen in battle—so that all of these might find room. It is the glory of a catehdral that none can claim it who is not willing to share it, that its hospitality is as wide as the requirements of a city's spiritual life. It is the people's church, the strangers' church, the city's church. It stands as a stone of witness, an outward and visible sign of the truth and power of spiritual forces. The silent influence of its mere physical presence is felt for good throughout the community, as it testifies to the supremacy of those truths and powers of the spirit without which culture is selfish, wealth is sordid, and power is brutal—those truths and powers of the spirit which must be physically embodied, and fittingly embodied, if they are fully to exert their potential influence upon the city's life.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

ANOTHER HYMN CRITICIZED.

Mr. Editor: I am writing to thank you for your recent articles on unfortunate lines or phrases in our hymns. May I suggest that you take up another well-known Easter hymn, No. 121 in the 1892 edition, and No. 173 in the 1916 edition. The first line of the third verse has always offended my sense of accuracy: "The three sad days are quickly sped." Unless we are to include Maundy Thursday, it is hard to find three days of sadness. Clearly this is a mistake of the translator, for the Latin original has "Surrexit die tertia," which is quite correct, and quite different from three days.

DuBOSE MURPHY.

Starkville, Miss., October 10, 1921.

(The phrase underlined by our correspondent is open to the criticism he suggests; though, of course, it is not without Scriptural authority in a literal sense. Our Lord, in explanation of "the sign of Jonah the prophet," said He would be "three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." And St. Mark, quoting obliquely His announcement at Caesarea Philippi of His death and resurrection, uses the expression, "And after three days rise again." (St. Matthew, however, gives "The third day He raised up.") These are the only passages which would justify the words of the hymn quoted, which do seem unfortunate, since not all worshippers know, perhaps, that among the Jews the phrase "after three days" meant "the third day"; as, indeed, it does with us in many instances. It is noteworthy that wherever our Lord's foretelling of His resurrection is referred to, whether by the angels at the tomb, by the Jews, or by His disciples, the time is given as "the third day."—Ed. S. C.)

THE MINISTRY AND UNITY.

Mr. Editor: The problem of the supply for the ministry is a serious one. If the reports are correct, there are five thousand vacant Protestant churches in America, and there has been a very large decrease in the past five years of candidates in the various seminaries of the Christian bodies.

The foolish criticism of the Scriptures for years past, the desire for wealth and pleasure among the masses, the attitude of passive indifference on the part of the heads of families to their sacred duties, the breaking of marriage vows and the lack of co-operation of the Christian bodies are to blame for the failure in solving the problem.

The different Christian communions must face this subject as a whole and not as separate organizations. The question must be frankly asked, Shall the Church as a unit work to save souls, or shall they work for their own shibboleth?

The ministry is the highest calling of life, and next to that are the medical and teaching professions. They deal with the spirit, body and mind of men. The highest ideals in man are inspired. By the faith that is within us we know that God is with us in all our work for His honor and glory and the upbuilding of the character and happiness of men. This inspires us to sacrifice. The man that is not willing to make sacrifice is not a fit worker in the kingdom of God. Sacrifice ennobles the man.

There are now in this vicinity a population of ten thousand, and five Protestant churches. Men good and true occupy each pulpit on Sunday, good equipment for each congregation has been provided, a seating capacity in the five churches will care for seventy-five hundred, the Sunday schools are fairly attended. The normal attendance is not seven hundred at the best service. There are five coal bills, five gas and electric bills, five sextons, five organists and five buildings, not one full except on some special occasion. An empty church. Suppers, carnivals, sales and entertainments do not inspire young men or any other class of people with reverence for the worship of God. The divisions among the Protestant churches create a rivalry that is unseemly and lowers respect. If the churches will bury their differences, stop erecting buildings that are not of the type to attract attention, and all make sacrifices for the glory of God and not for self, there will be plenty of men for the ministry. But there must be a unity of purpose, "one fold and one shepherd." There is only one God and Father of all and one Bible, and yet the way we conduct our work gives the impression that there are many Gods and many Bibles. The pulpit given over to sensational topics, various ideas about advertising, the services, exceptional musicales, moving pictures and many other things simply cheapen the Church and the Word.

The masses will be more ready to listen to a united voice than a divided one. The harvest is ripe, but the lack of unity scatters the harvest, and many are lost. Men and women seek organizations outside of the Church because every member is obligated to help a member. The Church in many cases turn those who appeal to them to secular organizations. This is not right. It robs the Church of its opportunities to extend its rightful sympathy. The Church is not a social organization, and yet in many ways it has been made so. The Church is a soul-saving body, and if it does not function in this manner it is a failure. "United we stand, divided we fall," applies to the Church as well as the State. The Church, by its divisions, has been made too cheap, and if it is to do its work the Church must be placed on a higher plane of value. Rivalry must cease. Not for money must it stand, not for social influence, but for righteousness, love, peace and blessing for all men.

CHINESE PLAN FOR CELEBRATION OF THE CENTENNIAL.

Bishop Graves, of Shanghai, writes that plans are being formed by the Chinese Standing Committee of the Diocese and by the American Council of Advice for the celebration of the Centennial of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society. The Bishop expects that the Centennial will be commemorated both by the Chinese and by Americans in all churches in the Diocese from October 30 to November 6. Offerings are to be made which will be forwarded to the Department of Missions for the work of the American Church throughout the world.

"All of us here," says Bishop Graves, "are grateful for all that the society has done for China and for its missionaries, and you may be assured that we will do all we can to manifest this feeling."

Financial Report For 1920.

Mr. Franklin Issues the Complete Figures for the First Year of the N.-W. C.

Here is the official report from Mr. Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, of the finances of the work under the Presiding Bishop and Council for the year 1920. The final report could not be made until detailed figures were received from all points in the mission field. In a preliminary statement issued early in the year Mr. Franklin stated that the figures at that time indicated a surplus of $150,407.32 usable for the reduction of deficit. This final report shows a surplus of $278,370.17, the difference being due to additional lapses in appropriations reported from the distant mission fields.

October 14, 1921.

To the Presiding Bishop and Council:

I present herewith final report of income and expenditures of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society for the calendar year of 1920:

Operating income	$3,483,124.53
Operating expense	3,204,754.36
Operating surplus	$ 278,370.17

This surplus has been appropriated to apply on the original Nation-Wide Campaign expense account. The detail of income and expenses is as follows:

Income.

Receipts applicable to 1920 quota, including Church School Lenten offerings	$3,027,518.28
Miscellaneous, including gifts not applicable to 1920 quota	80,867.21
Interest on trust funds	140,815.30
United Offering Woman's Auxiliary (1920 share)	157,449.23
Legacies available for appropriations	76,474.51
	$3,483,124.53

Expenses.

Balance of income over expenses.		278,370.17
		$3,483,124.53

The situation of the Society as to money borrowed is as follows:

Outstanding Loans, January 1, 1920.

*Reserve deposit cash in use	$ 330,000
*Borrowed against securities in reserve deposit account	293,000
Borrowed on note of Society	282,500
Total January 1, 1920	$1,085,500
Borrowed on note of Society in 1920, to meet current expenses	282,500
	$1,368,000
Paid, as of December 31, 1920	470,000
Balance due January 1, 1921	$ 898,000
Of which reserve deposit cash	330,000
January 1, 1921, loans from banks, of which $293,000 are secured by collateral	$ 568,000

The surplus over operating expenses for 1920, of $278,370.17, has been applied, in accordance with the orders of the General Convention, to a reduction in the expense account of the Nation-Wide Campaign. The deficit account of the Society is, therefore, as follows:

Original Nation-Wide Campaign expense account	$341,583.48
Reduced by application of surplus of 1920	278,370.17
Balance due on Nation-Wide Campaign account	$ 63,213.31
Deficit prior to 1919	266,357.47
Deficit for 1919	312,305.28
Total deficit January 1, 1921	$641,876.06

The Reserve Deposit accounts are held for the purpose of protecting the credit of the Society at such times as expenses exceed receipts, and must eventually be restored.

Respectfully submitted,

Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer.

Worldliness in the Church

Bishop W. T. Capers, Episcopal Charge.

The faith of the Church is being impinged upon by the spirit of the world. The Christian has lost his boldness and his valor. The world has him intimidated and cowed. This may seem a hard saying, but if the average communicant will reflect upon his conversation during the day, he will be surprised to find how many concessions he has made to the spirit of the world. The communicant has practically said something like this, "Well, after all, a man's religion belongs to his personal rights, and therefore every man has a right to live out his own life and his own religion, whether he be a Christian, a Jew or a Hottentot. I am going to attend to my business and he can attend to his." There is an apparent liberality in this utterance, and, to a degree, it might be justified; but in nearly every instance where such a statement is made, the life of this communicant is just as negative as his utterance. The chances are that he would never be suspected of being a vital, red-blooded Christian. When we reflect upon the truth, that the life of the Church is so much under the intimidation of the spirit of the world, we can hardly expect our sons to take up a cause, and give their life to it, which asks so little of their faith and of their manhood. There is nothing so demoralizing to the spirit of a soldier as the peace of an armistice: for him his virtue must live either in victory or in conflict. And if this be true of the soldier of the sword and cannon, it is all the more true of a soldier of the cross. There must be conflict before there can be heroism; there must be a vision of opposing forces before there can be volunteers for service.

If we are to act without fear of seeing the truth for ourselves in reference to the alarming decrease in the number of candidates for the ministry, we must take account of the worldliness within the rank and file of the Church. Through my six and one-half years in the Episcopate, I have found that a goodly percentage of the adults who have been presented to me for confirmation have seemed to think that the chief asset of the Church is its liberality toward "the pleasures of the world." There is a very marked lack of the spirit of repentance and of confession of sin among such, and the result of bringing into the life of the Church these "cakes not turned," as communicants of the Church, is to do the Church an incalculable wrong; for her morale is necessarily weakened and in consequence her fighting power is alarmingly reduced.

With this condition in the life of the Church it is hardly reasonable to expect that the growing child can be impressed by the reality of the Christian life of his home. It would seem just a natural result for the boy to turn his mind in the direction of that of his father and mother rather than to about face and give his thoughts to a ministry that involves the contradiction of much that he has been taught by precept and example.

THE FATHER THAT DWELLETH IN ME.

God, Who is infinite, boundless, eternal, transcending all, above and beyond all, is also imminent, filling all His creation, pervading all life, Himself the Life, the sustaining Power, the inmost Soul of all that is. "He is above all, and through all, and in you all!" "In Him we live and move, and have our being." And God is Love. His will toward us is the will of a loving Father. He is seeking to manifest Himself through us. He wishes us to be open channels through which His love and power may help those in need. In all our yearning sorrow over the stricken loved ones, He is travailing within us and within them, His Presence is often unrecognized, unknown. But He is always "closer to us than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet." And He wills the wholeness of our body, mind and spirit.

Then let us surrender our whole being to Him. Let us open our hearts, that He Who is within us may have full possession. Let our lives be so given to Him that He can manifest through us His love and healing power. Let our earnest aspiration be that of us it may be true in our limited measure, what was completely true of the Lord Jesus, "The Father that dwelleth in me, He doeth the works."—Mary Danforth Dodge, in the Nazarene.

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor.

SAILORS' DAY.

To many who are off the coast a special service to present the cause of the Seamen's Church Institute of America may not seem important, but an investigation of almost any parish will prove that it has some connection with the "toilers of the sea" through friends or relatives of its members, and besides, it is our duty as Christians to be interested in every form of social service, so we are presenting the material for use on Sailors' Sunday, thinking that it may be helpful at one or the other of the services on November 13, and to inform our readers of the work being done by the Church along this line.

Bishop Nichols, our Honorary President, appeals in his message for Sailors' Day this year for such an awakening as will put the sailor man on the map on Sailors' Day.

Suggested Text—Psalm 31, v. 2b (A. R. V.): "Be Thou to me a strong rock, a house of defense to save me."

Special Subject—"A House of Defense."

The Seamen's Church Institute is a "House of Defense" to the sailor. Its motto, Safety, Comfort, Inspiration (S. C. I.).

The "Seamen's Church Institute," a practical "House of Defense."

The institute in New York is the largest of its kind in the world, and comprises in its service to seamen each element in its motto:

Safety—It offers protection morally and physically to the sailor as he takes his shore leave.

He finds so much that he likes and needs that he does not have to fall a prey to vicious influences which are always in waiting.

His "dunnage" or baggage is protected and checked in a large storeroom for a long period at nominal charges.

It encourages thrift in the wage saving department, and forwards his savings to friends, family, and protects him against improvidence.

His health is safeguarded by competent medical advice and treatment.

At Sea—The radio furnishes medical advice on the Call KDKF.

Counsel and advice are ever ready in the chaplain's department.

Comfort—This great building has lodgings for 714 men. There is seldom an empty bed.

Plans now contemplate, with a new addition, 1,600 beds—The Seamen's Church Institute of New York is practically a town within a building containing a church, a complete hotel (lodging department, restaurant, soda fountain, news-stand, barber ship, etc.), a school (navigation and marine engineering, radio, and other educational features), a club (libraries, literature distributing, reading and game rooms, gymnasium, shower baths, etc.), a general store of "slop chest," a bank, a post-office, a labor or employment bureau, a theatre, a hospital and clinic, an express office and dunnage department, and a charity organization or welfare department. Together with its power, electric and refrigerating and other plants, the institute is truly self-contained, a city in itself, a community supply to meet a class need.

Inspiration—This is a Church Institute. The worship of God is a primary privilege. In a beautiful chapel the sailor may find his highest inspiration. Yet he is never coerced, he comes freely, and he does come.

The Foundation Rock of the Seamen's Church Institute is God.

This material house is none other than the house of God, the gate of heaven.

The Sailor—The sailor at heart is happy. At sea he knows danger and meets it courageously. Being naturally accustomed to danger, he is often the victim of other dangers that are more subtle and found ashore. He has always been the victim of exploitation—and the less Christian the interest shown the sailor in any port, the more unchecked the exploitation. Because of his happy, careless and confiding disposition, he is thereby very appreciative, and responds to friendliness and kindly service.

The Sailor's Dignity—As a class, he is intelligent, independent and sensitive. He does not care to be the object of charity

The Seamen's Church Institute is a philanthropy. It offers service—and the sailor pays his share.

The object for which the national organization was established was to reproduce the success of the New York Institute in other ports.

A Pressing Need in Manila for Service to Seamen—Bishop Morris says there is a project by the United States Government to develop shipping facilities and make Manila the principal shipping center of the Orient. The problem of the "destitute seamen" in that port is most pressing. The sailor is improvident. Reports to the Bishop, by a committee on a proposed seamen's mission, reveal a dire need for some Christian institution in that port to protect seamen. They draw their pay, and spend it all and become charges to the American Government for transportation home.

"As there is not a single place for their care in Manila at present—they always desired to get as far inland as possible 'to see the sights'—and to patronize as many 'joints' as their money permitted, until they were fleeced out of it. Then they knew they could always state that they were destitute, and be sent home."—From Report to the Bishop.

Havana, Cuba—At Havana, Cuba, through the earnest efforts of Bishop Hulse, the Y. M. C. A. Branch for Seamen, has allowed the Seamen's Church Institute of America to furnish a chaplain for seamen, and has placed all its religious work under his care. He is the only chaplain to seamen in this port. He works under the Bishop's direction. This chaplain, the Rev. K. L. Houlder, has had (before taking orders) nine years' experience as seaman, apprentice and officer in the British Merchant Marine.

There are many domestic ports in which there is inadequate provision for the sailor.

The day of the old-fashioned sailors' evangelist has passed, with his statistics of "so many tracts delivered."

The sailor cannot respond to a religion, which does not offer also some material comfort.

Safety and comfort underwrite inspiration to the sailor.

But Christian inspiration underwrites safety and comfort to the sailor.

Make the water fronts of the ports of the United States a Christian message rather than a menace to the sailor.

MORE EFFICIENT BIBLE INSTRUCTION.

We have robbed our news department of the following item:

"The Board of Religious Education of the Diocese of Washington announces two courses of instruction in Teacher Training to be given by the Rev. Charles E. McAllister on Thursday afternoons at 4:45 and Thursday evenings at 8 o'clock in Epiphany Parish Hall. The courses begin October 27, with intermissions on Thanksgiving Day and during the Christmas holidays. The classes are open without charge to all Sunday school teachers and those who wish to become teachers. The afternoon course will be, "How to Teach the Old Testament," and that in the evening, "How to Teach the Life of Christ." Each course will cover ten hours' work, and any member of the class attending all of the sessions, passing the examination and completing the course, will receive a certificate from the General Department of Religious Education in New York. This certificate will count toward the department's diploma as a licensed church teacher.

We print this here because we regard it as an item of such general interest and importance as to be worthy of comment.

One of the greatest needs that there is in our Church is for properly qualified Sunday school teachers.

The other day the writer was talking with a lady who is a regular church attendant about a book he had recently read entitled "The Story of the Life and Letters of St. Paul," and he commended to this lady. "Why," she said, "I didn't know St. Paul left any letters."

This represents the extent of the Bible knowledge of a great many of our people, a great many more of them than we of the clergy realize, and the establishment of a diocesan course of study for teaching people to teach the Bible is an example worthy of emulation by other dioceses.

The Bible affords the most interesting study in the world, but, like everything else, it is not every one who can make it interesting, and training along this line will do much to build up in the Episcopal Church those great adult Bible classes which are such a large part of the constituency of many of the denominational churches.

Church Intellegence

Letter from the Bishop of Delaware On Disarmament.

To the Clergy of the Diocese of Delaware:

Through the generosity of Mr. Henry B. Thompson, there has been sent to you a copy of the book of Will Irwin, entitled "The Next War." This unpretentious volume gathers into small scope a good deal of valuable and definite information about the armaments of nations and the part they have played in modern civilization.

It is becoming increasingly evident that these armaments are an intolerable burden to many nations and of questionable value to all. The policy they represent leads to national bankruptcy. If civilization, as represented by ordered governments, does not destroy war, war will destroy civilization.

Despite the fact that the United States has refused to participate in the League of Nations, the countries of the world have recognized its moral leadership by a cordial response to the call of the President to meet in conference and deliberate on international questions, and if possible devise a plan for the reduction of armaments by mutual agreement. The sessions will be held on the anniversary of the signing of the armistice, which brought an end to the fighting of the late war.

The representatives of the nations will be influenced in large measure by the state of public opinion here and in other countries. In the final analysis these momentous questions cannot be settled by diplomatists, but by the convictions of the people who compose the nations. The most fundamental is this—whether international difficulties shall be settled by an appeal to armed force or on the basis of recognized justice, honor and righteousness.

It belongs to the forces of organized Christianity to insist that a more sane as well as a more Christian method than an appeal to force shall be tried. Centuries ago our Christ made His appeal to the common brotherhood of mankind—the fellowship in the family of the God and Father of us all.

This book of Will Irwin's has been sent you that you may have information that reveals how the appeal to arms has failed and must continue to fail with ever-increasing disaster to the world and civilization. You have in the gospel the revelation of a divine plan, the spirit of which must be brought into the affairs of nations.

I write to ask that you use the Sunday of November 6 to preach this message anew from your pulpit and to ask your people to join with you in earnest prayer to Almighty God that this conference may lead to practical results in the reduction of armaments, both naval and military, and mark the beginning of a new spirit in the attitude of nations to the solution of those difficulties that threaten the peace of the future.

PHILIP COOK.

Seamen's Church Institute of America.

The Rev. Kenneth L. Houlder, formerly missionary at Deming, N. M., sailed on Saturday, September 24, on the United Fruit Co.'s S. S. "Ulua" for Havana, Cuba. He represents the Seamen's Church Institute of America as chaplain to seamen in that port. He will work under the direction of Bishop Hulse, through whose efforts it has been arranged for him to have headquarters at the Havana Branch of the Y. M. C. A. for Seamen He will have entire charge of the religious work of the institution. At present he will be the only Protestant chaplain to seamen in Havana.

The Rev. William T. Weston was appointed organizing secretary of the Seamen's Church Institute of America in June, 1921. He is located at present in San Pedro, Cal., developing the local institute in co-operation with the Diocesan Commission on Seamen's Work of the Diocese of Los Angeles. He expects to remove to ports on the north of the Pacific Coast for the work of organization in the fall of 1922.

The Very Rev. Sidney James, dean of the Tacoma (Wash.) Cathedral, has been appointed acting director of the Seamen's Church Institute of Tacoma, with general oversight of the local work. This institute, formerly administered by the "Missions to Seamen" of the English Church, was recently placed under the direction of the Seamen's Church Institute of America. Mr. Harry Ferneyhough, the local superintendent, will continue in that office.

The Seamen's Church Institute of America, through the co-operation and courtesy of the Seamen's Church Institute of New York, offers a fine opportunity for study and training in methods and practice of work for seamen. The work of the New York Institute is the result of years of tried and tested experience of ministering to seamen.

This splendid philanthropy offers an interesting specialization for clergymen, Seminary students or laymen. Several Seminary students have already taken positions here in the summer months. During the year several clergymen have spent a week or more at the institute.

All chaplains under the organization, now in active charge of seamen's work at various ports, have remained in New York for a period of study.

As this national work grows, there will be a further need for clergymen who desire to specialize in this important branch of Christian Social Service.

The General Secretary, the Rev. George C. Gibbs, gladly welcomes inquiry or correspondence on this subject. Headquarters, 25 South Street, New York, N. Y.

Many Thanks, Treasurers!

Thanks to a prompt response by so many diocesan treasurers to our emergency telegram, the receipts for September were $9,635.43 better than for the same month last year.

But we had to add $50,000 to our loans, which are now $300,000, on current account, in addition to the loans carried over from last year.

Why not start to pay off in October?

Lewis B. Franklin.

Synod of the Province of New York and New Jersey.

The Synod of the Province of New York and New Jersey will meet at Garden City, L. I., November 15-17, the opening service being held in the Cathedral of the Incarnation, with addresses by Bishops Burgess, Brent and Manning. A very interesting program has been prepared, and includes such well-known men as the Rev. E. S. Pearce, the Rev. Canon Lewis, Bishop Matthews, of New Jersey; the Rev. Dr. W. A. R. Goodwin, and the Hon. William J. Tully.

St. Stephen's College Opens With Large Enrollment.

The only reason that St. Stephen's College, which opened late in September, is not able to report the doubling of its enrollment this year is that it was already full to capacity last year. Over twice as many students decided to enter the college this year as could possibly be taken care of. As a result the men were thoroughly sifted and only those exceedingly well prepared were accepted. The dormitories this autumn are full and students are lodged in the nearby village.

There have been a number of additions to the faculty this year. The chief of these are:

Archie W. Henzell, M. S., member of the American Society of Engineers, as Associate Professor of Physics; James A. Muller, Ph. D., Princeton, Associate Professor of History; Leonell C. Strong, Ph. D., Columbia, Associate Professor of Biology; John W. Vienna, Associate Professor of Political Science and Instructor in European Languages.

During the summer the Biological Laboratory was enlarged and the Chemical and Physics Laboratories completely reconstructed. The library has been put in charge of Miss Grace Littell, for fifteen years assistant librarian at the General Theological Seminary.

A feature of the work this year is the open lecture course arranged for the students and the neighborhood. The lectures will include some of the most prominent people now in the United States, among them being Sir William Ramsay, the archeologist; the Hon. Alanson B. Houghton, M. C.; Dr. William Norman Guthrie, Dean Julian Park, of the University of Buffalo, etc. The subjects are sociological, political and literary.

Jubilee of Woman's Auxiliary Observed at Church Missions House.

Special services commemorating the Jubilee of the Woman's Auxiliary were held at the Church Missions House, New York City, on Thursday, October 20.

The Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor was the celebrant and preached the sermon at the communion service held at 10 o'clock, and the Rt. Rev. Arthur S. Lloyd, for many years President of the Board of Missions, made a short address at the noon-day prayer service. Bishop Gailor preached on the missionary duty and privilege of the Church, while Bishop Lloyd's talk was in the nature of a tribute to Miss Julia C. Emery and other faithful women to whom the Auxiliary owes much of its splendid progress, and upon whose wisdom and devotion depends the working out of larger things in the future.

There were many of the women who served the Auxiliary in its earlier days present at the services, about seventy-five being in attendance, in addition to the Church Missions House staff.

Mrs. A. L. Sioussat, President of the Woman's Auxiliary in Maryland, presided at the session held in the auxiliary rooms. Mrs. Sioussat has been identified with the work almost from its inception when the resolution was passed during the convention of 1871 in Baltimore, from which date the Auxiliary traces its growth.

Miss Julia C. Emery, for forty years secretary of the Auxiliary, told of some of the things accomplished and spoke of the outlook for the future. Miss M. T. Emery, who assisted her sister in the Auxiliary, also made a brief address.

Mrs. John Markoe, of Philadelphia, treasurer of the Auxiliary, reported that the Emery Fund has passed the $64,000 mark.

NORTH CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

Christ Church, Raleigh, celebrates Centennial With Splendid Services.

Christ Church, the Rev. Milton A. Barber, rector, held Centennial observances beginning Sunday, October 9, and ending Wednesday, October 12.

The Sunday morning ceremonies, when Bishop Gailor was the preacher, were unusually impressive. The day began with Corporate Communion for the whole parish at half past 7; Bishop Sheshire was celebrant and the parish clergy, the Rev. Milton A. Barber and Rev. B. M. Lackey, assisted. The communicants ran up into the hundreds, and the full choir rendered the music. At 11 A. M. the church was crowded to capacity. The procession of choir, clergy and bishops, with the banner-bearers holding aloft superb silk banners bearing texts of suggestive appropriateness, made a beautiful and impressive scene.

Bishop Gailor's sermon made a profound impression, his text being the tenth verse of the third chapter of Ephesians. Before beginning his sermon, however, the Bishop gave some interesting history in connection with the relations between the Dioceses of North Carolina and Tennessee.

Other clergy taking part in the service were Bishop Cheshire, the Rev. M. A. Barber, rector; the Rev. B. M. Lackey, curate; the Rev. I. McK. Pittinger, rector-emeritus of the Church of the Good Shepherd; the Rev. I. Harding Hughes, headmaster of St. Nicholas' School; the Rev. W. W. Way, rector of St. Mary's School, and the Rev. J. E. Ingle.

The church was beautifully decorated with palms and flowers in the chancel, and flags and pennants were suspended throughout the church.

At the night service Bishop Cheshire spoke feelingly of the former rectors, beginning with a fine tribute to Bishop Ravenscroft, and giving high praise to his successors. Monday witnessed the consecration of the Chapel of the Annunciation adjoining the church, and historical addresses by Marshall DeLancey Haywood and Captain S. A. Ashe in the evening. Tuesday brought greetings from the Rev. C. A. Ashby, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, and other churches and schools, together with a fine choir service. A large reception Wednesday evening brought the great observance to a close. Christ Church in the last one hundred years has had a galaxy of distinguished membership not perhaps equaled by any other church in the South, and expressions of interest in the Centennial came from far and wide.

Charleston to Celebrate Missionary Centennial.

In celebration of the Centennial anniversary of the Missionary Society of the Episcopal Church, a united service will be held on Sunday evening, November 6, in St. Philip's Church. All the Episcopal Churches in the city will take part. A special program of music will be arranged for this service.

The Clericus: The Rev. William Way, rector of Grace Church, was recently elected president of the Clericus for the ensuing year, succeeding the late Rev. John Kershaw, D. D. The Rev. Wallace Martin, chaplain for the Harriett Pinckney Home for Seamen, was elected secretary. The meetings of the Clericus are held the first and third Thursdays of the month.

The Harriett Pinckney Home, Charleston, fills a great need for seamen who may be stranded in this port During the months of August and September the Home, through its chaplain, the Rev. Wallace Martin, gave 1,519 lodgings. One-third of these were free, and in this time of unemployment the resources of the Home are taxed to the utmost.

MARYLAND

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

Jubilee of Woman's Auxiliary of Special Interest to Maryland.

The celebration of the Golden Jubilee of the Woman's Auxiliary had a special significance in the Diocese of Maryland. Here it was fifty years ago when the General Convention met in Baltimore that the Woman's Auxiliary had its beginnings. It was organized in Emmanuel Church, and in that church on St. Luke's Day the Jubilee service was held. The church was filled with representatives from branches of the Auxiliary from all parts of the Diocese. Bishop Gailor, President of the Council, brought the message and greeting of the Presiding Bishop, Bishop Tuttle. In his address of welcome the Rev. Hugh Birckhead, D. D., rector of the church, said that the Episcopal Church had inherited in some measure what has been termed "the Islander Spirit," from England. Without deprecating this spirit altogether, he said that unless it contributed to the larger world spirit it was narrow and provincial. The Woman's Auxiliary gave emphasis to the world spirit, and has ever held aloft the vision of world service for Christianity. Luncheon at the Belvedere Hotel followed the service, at which Bishop Gailor was the principal speaker. Bishop Gailor affirmed that the Church was awakened from its sleep by the Woman's Auxiliary and reminded the Church of its militant function. Other Bishops present who spoke were Bishop Philip Cook, of the Diocese of Delaware; Bishop George W. Davenport, of the Diocese of Easton. Bishop Murray, of Maryland, said that no other organization in the Diocese had helped him so much as the Woman's Auxiliary. In connection with the Golden Jubilee, Bishop Murray issued a letter of appreciation and of thanks for the work of the Auxiliary.

The other speakers at the luncheon were Miss Margaretta Ridgely, missionary to Liberia, and Miss Evelyn Diggs, missionary to the Philippines, both Baltimore women, home on furlough. The General Secretary of the Auxiliary, Miss Grace Lindley, also made an address. Mrs. Albert Sioussat, for many years diocesan head of the Woman's Auxiliary, presided at the luncheon, and announced that the Thank Offering Fund was $3,759, although the goal that had been set was only $2,000.

Much Regret Over Dr. McComb's Departure.

The Rev. Canon Samuel McComb, D. D., who has accepted a call of the Episcopal Theological School of Cambridge, and also to be preacher at St. John's Church, has won many friends and admirers in the Diocese of Maryland who regret his leaving. In addition to being Canon Missioner of the pro-Cathedral, Dr. McComb organized a tuberculosis class in the southern crowded section of Baltimore for poor patients, who receive the best medical treatment and are instructed in proper care of themselves in their homes. Dr. McComb has also been in demand as special preacher and speaker on public occasions.

WEST VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Coadjutor.

Opening of St. Hilda's Hall

St. Hilda's Hall, Charles Town, began its seventh session with a record enrollment on Thursday morning, September 22.

Singular interest attached to the opening exercises held for the first time in the auditorium of the newly-erected "Peterkin Hall," St. Hilda's tribute to the memory of Bishop Peterkin, the well-beloved first Bishop of West Virginia, and his father, the Rev. Joshua Peterkin. The Rev. Conrad Goodwin, rector of Zion Church, and Bishop Gravatt extended words of welcome and inspiration, recalling the character of Bishop Peterkin, of whose death this day was an anniversary. Students, faculty and visitors were acutely conscious of the significance of the occasion when a new building with the stamp of a great spirit was being turned over for the first time to a group of young people who should hold it in trust until they turned it over to future classes.

The school opens with a bright prospect for the year. The addition of the handsome new hall with its studio, laboratory, auditorium and classrooms, is an invaluable aid in further development and influence. The success of the work is pronounced to a most marked degree. Yet the fulfilment of the past is not so great as the promise of the future.

EASTON

Rt. Rev. Geo. W. Davenport, D. D., Bishop.

Meeting of Southern Convocation.

The Southern Convocation met in St. Paul's Church, Marion, Tuesday and Wednesday, October 4 and 5, fourteen clergymen being present. After a short service Tuesday evening, addresses on Missions were made by the Dean of the Convocation, the Rev. Sydney A. Potter, and the Bishop of the Diocese. These were followed by the Rev. F. J. Bohanan, on Social Service. At the Holy Communion Wednesday morning the Bishop preached from the text, "Where there is no vision, the people perish." After service the Convocation met in business session, and accepted an invitation to hold the January meeting in St. Paul's, Vienna. Convocation, then recessed to partake of a most excellent luncheon served in the church-yard by the ladies of the parish.

In the afternoon the Convocation reassembled to engage in a conference on the Nation-Wide Campaign, led by the Rev. W. C. Marshall and Rev. Dr. Walter Archbold. The Virginia chart was displayed, and the Bishop was requested to secure a similar one for this Diocese. Miss Helen Jennings, of Pottsville, Pa., who is now conducting teacher training classes, in various parts of the Diocese, spoke at length on How to Improve Our Sunday Schools, and was followed by the Rev. R. B. Matthews, on the Church and the Young People.

St. John's Church, Crisfield, is being moved to the rectory lot, bought several months ago, a more desirable locality, and more convenient to the residential section. This parish has taken on new life, and seems to be doing well.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Nation-Wide Campaign Work in the Diocese.

Carrying out the plan of the Diocesan Committee to hold meetings of clergy and representatives from neighboring parishes at central points all over the Diocese, all-day meetings were held last week at Christ Church, Gordonsville, on October 18th; St. John the Baptist Church, near Ivy, on the 19th, and at Mission Home, in Greene County, on the 20th. The meetings were conducted by the Rev. G. M. Brydon and Miss Sallie C. Deane, of Richmond. Large and most interested congregations were in attendance at these services.

The whole Diocese has been practically covered by meetings of this kind, and the members of the Diocesan Committee have found everywhere a spirit of intense earnestness and enthusiasm for the work of the campaign.

The Valley Convocation.

The one hundred and thirty-seventh semi-annual session of the Valley Convocation met at Emmanuel Church, Boyce, October 5 and 6.

Holy Communion was celebrated by the dean and a very timely and forcible sermon was preached by the Rev. William Clayton Torrence, of Front Royal. The Rev. Nelson Dame, D. D., delivered a most inspiring address on Wednesday night, telling of the great advance of the Church in the last two years and urging all the people of this Diocese to make the third year of the Nation-Wide even greater in its influence and results than the first two years.

The Rev. Robert B. Nelson spoke on Thursday morning of the "Opportunities of the Laymen of the Church to Help in Its Advance Movement." This day being "Men's Day." the afternoon was given over entirely to addresses of prominent laymen. Dr. C. O. Dearmont spoke on "How to Help in Raising the Low Moral Standards of the Day." The Hon. W. T. Lewis spoke on "What Can Our Parish Do for the Community." Major B. M. Roszel, Ph. D., spoke on "Stewardship of Time and Money."

In all of these addresses there was a very clear insistence upon the fact that the time had come for the laymen of the Church to take a more active and responsible part in the Church's work.

After a vote of thanks for the generous hospitality, Emmanuel Church Convocation adjourned to hold its spring meeting at Mt. Jackson.

The Woman's Auxiliary: An unusually interesting program has been prepared for the meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary in Monumental Church, Richmond, November 2 and 3. On Tuesday evening, November 1, a reception will be given in the rectory, 106 East Franklin Street, to the officers, delegates, visiting clergy and missionary speakers; on Wednesday morning at 9:30 Bishop Brown will celebrate Holy Communion, and the meeting will close with a beautiful pageant on Thursday evening. The meetings are open to the public and everybody will be cordially welcomed.

The Junior Auxiliary will hold its annual meeting at Monumental Church, Richmond, November 2. The Leaders' Conference with Mrs. Barton will be held at 11 o'clock Wednesday, and there will be a mass meeting of Juniors at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. All delegates will please send their names to Miss Kate F. Meade, 406 Seminary Avenue, Richmond.

Jubilee of Woman's Auxiliary Commemorated.

A special service for the Woman's Auxiliary to commemorate the Jubilee of the Auxiliary was held at Epiphany Church on Thursday morning, October 13. Holy Communion was celebrated by the Bishop of the Diocese, and the sermon was preached by Dr. Freeman, rector of Epiphany Church. Announcement was made that the quota for the Emery Fund from the Diocese of Washington is $1,000, and that over $600 has already been raised for this purpose.

Sunday School Institute Well Attended.

The twenty-fifth annual convention of the Sunday School Institute of the Diocese of Washington was held in Epiphany Church on Wednesday, October 19, with a splendid attendance and strong and helpful program. The convention was begun by a celebration of the Holy Communion in the church, after which the convention adjourned to the Parish Hall to hear a stirring address by the Rev. Dr. Samuel S. Drury. A conference of great interest was conducted in the afternoon by the Rev. James Lawrence Ware, field secretary for Sunday schools of the Province of Washington. Mr. Ware's subject was, "Why Trained Teachers?" and opportunity was given for questions and discussion. At 8 o'clock in the evening a public meeting was held in the church, and to this meeting parents were especially urged to come. Dr. Freeman delivered the address on "The Abdication of the Parent."

The annual meeting of the Laymen's Service Association of the Diocese was held in Epiphany Parish Hall on Monday evening, October 10.

St. Andrew's Church has begun a series of Christian Healing services, to be conducted by the rector, the Rev. J. J. Dimon. This is the third parish in the Diocese holding such services, the other two being St. Stephen's and Epiphany.

The united conferences on Church Missions in the four group churches, designated for these services, were a great success from the standpoint of numbers attending, enthusiasm and splendid speakers. Many points of doubt about the Nation-Wide Campaign were cleared away, and a better general understanding of the undertaking has resulted fsom these conferences.

The new chancel of Christ Church, S. E., was dedicated by the Bishop of Washington at the eleven o'clock service Sunday, October 23, when the Bishop preached the sermon and celebrated the Holy Communion. Alterations begun last June at Christ Church are now complete and have resulted in several needed changes. The building has been lengthened, giving ample space for a large choir in the chancel, and the organ has been moved from the back of the church.

St. Margaret's Church was opened for public services on Sunday, October 23, for the first time in three months on account of extensive repairs and changes being made there.

The fall meeting of the Junior Assembly of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew of Washington was held on Friday evening, October 21, at St. Matthew's Church, Hyattsville, when reports on the recent convention in Norfolk were made.

Church Home for Children.

"The Church Home for Children of St. John's Parish," Jacksonville. opened recently, and is destined to play an important part in molding the lives of the young children in the care of the Church.

The Home is located at Keystone Bluff, on the south bank of the St. Johns. This beautiful estate of approximately twenty-eight acres was formerly the winter home of Mrs. Mary Packer Cummings, late of Mauch Chunk, Pa., who died October 29. 1912, in that city. By the terms of Mrs. Cummings' will, Keystone Bluff was bequeathed to St. John's Parish "in trust to be used as a home for children on the plan of the Church Home at Johnstown, in the Diocese of Bethlehem. Mrs. Cummings also gave "for the support and maintenance of said home the sum of fifty thousand dollars," as an endowment.

One of the most important points in connection with the institution is that it is to be self-sustaining.

No contributions will be asked of the public or Church members; there will be no annual drives or campaigns for funds.

The Home, which is modern and well equipped in every way, will be conducted as a home, with the most wholesome home environment, where high ideals will be instilled in the minds of the children. On the other hand, the children will be made to feel their responsibilities, and realize their part in building up the home and preparing for their places in the business and professional life.

In addition to the general educational course which will be provided, there will be special opportunities for boys to learn farming, manual training or other vocations; those who develop an inclination for a theological course will be sent to the University of the South, at Seawnee, Tenn.

Officers include the Rev. Van Winder Shields, D. D., president; John S. Bond, executive chairman and treasurer; F. P. Dearing, secretary; the Rev. Ambler M. Blackford, housefather; Board of Managers, the Rev. V. W. Shields, D. D., John S. Bond, Frank P. Dearing, William A. Bours, Francis P. Fleming, James V. Freeman, M. D., and Joel H. Tucker.

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gailor, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. Troy Beatty, D. D., Coadjutor.

Meeting of the Convocation of Nashville.

This convocation was held at Mount Pleasant, Tenn., October 10-12. The convocation opened Monday night with Evening Prayer read by the Rev. Bernard Campbell, of Franklin. The Rev. James M. Maxon, of Nashville, preached on the Teaching Mission of the Church.

Tuesday morning the Rev. A. C. Killeffer, dean, celebrated the Holy Communion, and the Rev. P. A. Pugh preached. The afternoon was devoted to business. The Rev. P. A. Pugh was nominated to the Bishop as dean for the ensuing year. The Rev. J. R. Sharp was elected secretary and the Rev. B. Campbell treasurer. The Rev. E. T. Clark read Evening Prayer, and the Rev. R. E. Campbell, O. H. C., preached on Repentance. The Bishop-Coadjutor celebrated the Lord's Supper at seven A. M. on Wednesday. At ten o'clock an interesting review of books was held, to suggest good reading for Church people. In the afternoon there was a brief business session, at which Dr. Maxon presented the claims of Episcopal endowment. The Woman's Auxiliary also met in the church, and was largely attended. Bishop Beatty, after a short address recommending Columbia Institute, confirmed a class in the afternoon. The Rev. Mr. Helm, of Winchester, read Evening Prayer, and the Rev. Phillips S. Gilman preached on the Healing Mission. Many came forward to receive healing. Dr. Maxon suggested that as a result of the convocation, the community should be impressed. Hence two by two the clergy went about inviting townfolk to come. It was gratifying to note a good congregation the first night, and that the crowds could not be accommodated the last two nights. Altogether, this was voted to have been the best meeting held by convocation for many years.

The death of Miss Annie Orr, one of Nashville's most prominent churchwomen, called for the return of Dr. Mercer P. Logan for her funeral.

The Men's Club of Christ Church gave a reception to Bishop Beatty on his arrival in Nashville.

Dr. Maxon, by special request, preached a sermon to newsboys of Nashville the Nineteenth Sunday after Trinity.

St. John's Church, Knoxville, is duly observing the Missionary Centennial. The rector, the Rev. Walter C. Whitaker, D. D., is delivering a series of six addresses of an informative nature on "The Episcopal Church." On Sunday, October 30, the missionary pageant will be given in the churches. The rectors of St. John's and the Epiphany and the Rev. Franklin Osborne, of Brazil, will take part, and the Coadjutor-Bishop will be present. A joint missionary service will be held in the Church of the Epiphany at night.

Church Activities in New York:

Installation and Consecration of Suffragan Bishops.

Trinity Calls Another Pastor: Churches Organize for Work to Bring About Disarmament.

Announcement is made that the installation of Bishop Lloyd as Bishop-Suffragan, and the consecration of the Rev. Dr. Herbert Shipman, of Heavenly Rest Parish, as Bishop-Suffragan, will take place at the Cathedral on St .Andrew's Day next. Three of the bishops taking part will be Tuttle, Lines and Manning.

Trinity Parish has elected the Rev. Dr. Caleb Rochford Stetson, rector of St. Mark's Parish, Washington, to be its rector, succeeding, if he accepts, Bishop Manning, who has served some months since his consecration as Bishop of New York, as rector. The election was made upon recommendation of Bishop Manning, and is reported to have been unanimous. It is the second attempt to get a rector, the first one having elected the Rev. Dr. Samuel S. Drury, of St. Paul's School, Concord, who declined.

The Rev. Dr. Stetson is a native of Boston, and is fifty years old. He was educated at Harvard and the General Seminary, besides spending some time at the Virginia Seminary. Throughout most of his ministry he has been associated with the Diocese of Washington, being identified with St .Mark's, the parish in the East Capitol district.

In 1907 he came to Trinity Parish as vicar of the parish church and served a little over four years, returning to St. Mark's, Washington, as rector. It is understood that this time the election will succeed, and that Dr. Stetson will early relieve Bishop Manning as rector. As all know, Trinity is one of the greatest parish churches in the world.

Because of foundations laid by his predecessors, Bishop Manning was able to begin his Episcopate with vastly greater resources and far greater diocesan solidarity and enthusiasm than had any other diocesan. Precisely what the bishops named did for Bishop Manning and the Church in the Diocese, the Rev. Dr. Manning, as rector of Trinity; the Rev. Drs. McComas, Gates and Bellinger did in Trinity Parish for the Rev. Dr. Stetson and the Church in New York and in the nation.

Churches Are Entering Upon a Militant Task: Those of New York are right up at the front. They announce that they will not be satisfied with mere talk about disarmament, as sole outcome of the November conference at Washington. They admit profound distrust of politicians, some of whom they say shout for peace, while investing in stock of munition factories. The Federal Council of Churches has called for prayer for the success of the conference, and especially for President Harding, but the churches of New York, probably of the country, have gone far beyond. They announce purpose not only to pray, but to work.

Churches in entire States have organized for work to bring about disarmament. These include New York, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Ohio and California. Cities that have planned work include New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Minneapolis, San Francisco, Indianapolis, Pittsburgh, Erie and Washington. Laymen are entering the task, and preparing to tell the politicians that something tangible must be done. They say that nothing short of half reduction will be accepted, together with instant stopping of construction until real conditions can be ascertained. In the plans the laymen of the churches of England, France, Scotland and Switzerland have been consulted. Literature is going out that is straight from the shoulder in its statements.

The power of the churches, never greater than today, if only it be exercised, is being pointed out. All over the country the week beginning on November 7 is to be devoted to organized effort, aiming not merely to pray, but to create a public sentiment that will compel action at Washington. Unemployment is due to withdrawal of capital, and capital withdraws because of surtaxes, and surtaxes are levied because of war costs. The remedy is to stop war costs. And Church people are determined that shall be done, and done now.

Death of the Rev. John Keller.

The Rev. John Keller, a widely known clergyman of the Diocese of Newark, died suddenly after a brief illness, not thought dangerous, on October 22, in his sixty-first year. Born in Philadelphia, he was ordained in 1886 and was for some years in charge of the church at Arlington, N. J.; for more than twenty-five years he has been the diligent secretary of the Convention, and before that time he was assistant secretary. He was an alumni trustee of the General Seminary and secretary of the Alumni Association. He was a man of varied gifts and wide company of friends.

Collect for Twenty-third Sunday After Trinity.

O God, our refuge and strength, Who art the author of all godliness; be ready, we beseech Thee, to hear the devout prayers of Thy Church, and grant that those things which we ask faithfully we may obtain effectually; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for All Saints' Day.

(November 1.)

O Almighty God, Who hast knit together Thine elect in one communion and fellowship, in the mystical body of Thy Son Jesus Christ our Lord: Grant us grace so to follow Thy blessed saints in all virtuous and godly living, that we may come to those unspeakable joys which Thou hast prepared for those who unfeignedly love Thee; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

For the Southern Churchman.

The following lines were written at a time of great trial. When passing Grace Church, New York, the chimes rang, "When I Survey the Wondrous Cross," and the vision of the Transfiguration came vividly to the writer.

The Shining of His Presence.

"He was transfigured before them: . . . His face did shine as the sun, and His raiment was white as the light."—Mark 9-2.

Martha Elvira Pettus.

My soul was stricken in sorrow,
  Great fear oppressed my heart;
I prayed: and He gave me a vision.
  A mountain, high, apart:

A mountain, cloud-enfolded
  (Through clouds, pale glories shine:)
And One stood transfigured before me,
  My Lord—my King Divine!

In His face, as the sun in its brightness,
  Love, grace and power are seen:
His garment, as light in its whiteness
  Is like no earthly sheen.

O Christ! for me transfigured!
  Adoring, I kneel at Thy feet,
Ah, who am I, that such glory
  Such rapture, my eyes should greet?

Thou dost show me Thyself, my Saviour,
  Thou hast given my spirit sight;
In an hour of dread came the shining,
  The flash of Thy raiment white!

And there falls in benediction
  A Voice from the mountain apart:
"My Son, My Beloved, is with thee,
  O child, give Him all thy heart!"

Faithful Unto Death.

The Story of a Missionary in Korea.

She went to Korea (or Chosen, as we now call it), a bride, almost at the very beginning of missions in that corner of the Orient. Only six years before had the hermit nation been opened to the gospel by the surgical ministrations of Dr. Allen, and except at Seoul, the capital, hardly one of those living stones had yet been laid in the foundation of the wonderful Korean Church.

Annie Laurie Adams Baird had the high faith and courage that marks the soul of the pioneer; she had the pioneer perseverance also, and it was fitting that she should be chosen for what she would call the pioneer's privileges.

She never would admit that there were any hardships peculiar to mission work; if there were things hard to bear they were shared in common with the globe trotter or the gold seeker, and could not waver the balance, when weighed over against the joys of the service. She recognized missionary temptation to mental and spiritual backsliding, she wrote entertainingly of missionary joys and diversions, but missionary trials were touched upon with whimsical humor, and the loneliness of the life only drew her near to God.

"The mission field has no lesson for us so ineffably sweet and precious as that of drawing strength and inspiration from the Master Himself. We learn what it is to work away from day to day and month to month and year to year, unknown and unpraised of men, and yet more than rewarded by the thought of that time when every man shall have praise of God."

So much for loneliness; as to disease she had these words of ringing faith and commonsense courage:

"All we can do as to noxious germs is to dismiss the thought of them with the reflection that the same God who made them is able to control their action. With regard to unhygienic conditions which cannot be avoided, the advice, 'Keep your mind off them,' applies with special force. In a country like Korea, where the rooms are very small, with no provision for ventilation, the missionaries are often obliged to spend hours of their time crowded in with unwashed human beings, in an atmosphere so vile that the very candles threaten to go out. Livingston found strength in the assurance that we are all immortal till our work is done, and so can we."

When she went with her husband, the Rev. William M. Baird, inland from the port station of Fusan to open the work at Taiku in 1898, the journey took three days; it can now be made by train in less than four hours. The women then traveled in chairs, the men on pack ponies.

As it was the foreigner's first invasion of new territory, they hit upon the expedient of adopting native dress to curb some inconvenient curiosity. The servants at Fusan cheerfully fitted Mrs. Baird out in a Korean costume beyond criticism in any detail, but the fear and consternation of the natives at the sight of this fair-haired, slender and (to them) abnormally tall Korean in their midst nullified all the hoped-for good of the familiar garb.

Some who came on their first "sight-see" at the new home might have been heard to mutter:

"What makes her skin so white?"

"Because she drinks cow's milk!"

"Did you ever hear of anything so disgusting?"

It was about this time that one, bolder than the rest, seated herself in a rocking chair, which she manipulated so vigorously that it threw her out sprawling, adding terror to the curiosity that had been prevailing among the sightseers.

The people, as she met them, she loved with whole-souled devotion, and her sympathy touched every detail of their lives. When the heartbroken grandmother came to sob out her grief at the death of the one little son of the family and cry, "They say he will be grown up when I see him again. I won't know him if he is grown up. I would be afraid of him! I want to carry him on my back again and look back over my shoulder into his little face. Tell me that what they say isn't true!" the mother heart of the missionary responded, "I, too, knew what it was to long unspeakably for the weight of a dear little boy, and to listen for the patter of baby feet where there was only silence, so I could sympathize with her. She was dirty and ill-smelling, and I, to her, a person of uncanny complexion, and of strange race, but as we wept in each other's arms we were conscious only of our common motherhood, and the blessed assurance that God was to give us, by and by, all that we longed for."

After a few years at Taiku they were transferred to Pyeng Yang, where Mrs. Baird's greatest work was done. Her husband was made president of the Union Christian College, and Mrs. Baird took all the students into her big mother heart. The thing that oftenest distressed her was the unhappy married state of so many of them. Weddings had been arranged by their parents in early youth, so the finest Christian young man might be bound to a wife utterly unfitted for him in her tastes, training or sympathy. To help these men to stand true to what often seemed a hopelessly bad bargain, to try to raise these wives, heathen perhaps, to standards of education and character that would make them truly helpmeets in the task of leadership for the Korean church, required all her tact and love.

But one of these same little wives told her husband, after Mrs. Baird had visited in the home, that she was "just like a loving-hearted old Korean woman," and the missionary took that as her most precious compliment, richly repaying the years of expatriation and of effort to project herself into the language and feeling of another people."

On one of her returns to America the college boys gave her, as a parting gift which they had had made to order, a huge silver brooch, almost a breast-plate, intended by their custom for a bridal ornament. It was the ground for many a merry argument in the Baird family, whether it was given her in honor of her own perennial youthfulness, or because of her interest in other folks' romances.

All the political changes and upheavals that came to poor harassed Korea, she met in the spirit of love. At the very beginning of the Japanese occupation of the country she wrote of the new problem before the missionaries, "To love these Japanese, a sort of step-children, as we do our very own, the Koreans," and she never failed in her purpose, to love.

So she lived among them for nearly a quarter of a century, more than half that time fighting a bave battle with malignant disease. "I have really lost count of my surgical operations," she told a friend, "but I am sure there have been more than thirty of them."

The best skill. both in the medical corps of the Korea Mission and among American surgeons, was freely given in the attempts to save her for longer years of usefulness, but after the last possible effort had been resorted to by a prince of his profession in a great American university, he found the disease redeveloping, and he told her only a few weeks or life might be left her.

She made decision at once that she would attempt a return to Korea, where Dr. Baird had remained on duty while she came to this country with their sons; she might have summoned him by cable, and united the family for these last weeks, but she would not call him from the work that needed him, so she engaged the earliest possible reservation on a Pacific steamer, her sailing date for her last journey being the twenty-fifth anniversary of her honeymoon voyage to Korea.

She took time only to keep a joyous Thanksgiving season with her three student sons in their college home, saying of those days, "The boys and I agreed that we are going to play the glad game to the very end." She delayed for no farewells to her kinfolk along the way as she sped across the continent, but hastened on her journey, that might end in the dear land of Korea, or in that dearer heavenly country. Life ebbed fast as she as borne on her way; much of the time on shipboard, she lay semi-conscious, but she said, "I could not go, for I felt the greatly encompassing volume of the prayers of my friends, holding me up, and holding me back from death."

She had rallied when she reached Japan, where her husband came to meet her; she had a long rest in a hospital there, and another in Seoul, among her mission friends, then she was taken "by Pullman de luxe," as she said, contrasting it with her other wearisome journeys, home to Pyeng Yang, where she had so longed to be.

The whole Korean Church was praying for her recovery, and the hand of death was marvellously stayed. Not weeks, but months, were added to her life. Once in the dear old home she almost seemed on the road to recovery: she could see her friends, and she tried to stay the flood of loving attentions that overwhelmed her, in the joy of the Koreans over their answered prayers for her returning strength. Then came a few days of weariness, but none of the pain they had feared for her, and she left them all one night in June, 1916.

The news of her passing over was carried by messenger out to the farthest group of Christians, and they came from the far corners of the land to do her honor. No building in the city could have held their vast congregation, so they stood in the sweet summer sunshine around her casket. They sang some of the many hymns she had given them in her work of translation, for most of their Christian music was her gift to them.

Japanese officialdom was there, mingling with the Koreans in the time of common grief. The missionaries had their word to say, then some of the outstanding Korean pastors spoke appraising her life from the Korean viewpoint, telling of the gift she had offered of a loving wife, shown most of all by that second giving of herself when she had risked the long, hard journey back to Korea, that she might fall asleep and be laid to rest among those she loved best.

Words could not express their depth of sorrow, but they offered service that might show the honor they longed to do her. The pastor and leaders of the church asked the privilege of carrying the casket to the grave, a mile or more distant, and so, in relays, they bore her forth.

It had been thought, hitherto, an unspeakable degradation to do such an office for the dead, and the task had been left for the most contemptible of the coolies. That these men, held in honor by their own people, had begged as a privilege that they might do it for a foreigner, and still more, for a foreign woman, was indeed a token of a love and respect almost worship in its intensity, and it testified how the love of her life had brought answer from these hearts she had won to herself and to her Master. —Mary Tyrrell, in Presbyterian Banner.

Sheltered.

Eugenie du Maurier.

Within the church-yard garden, pale and tall,
The stately lilies blow a fragrant prayer,
The roses dream, and through the broken wall
The honeysuckle greets the golden air.
So, in the hidden garden of the heart,
Sheltered from all the world, sweet fancies grow;
And fair ideals, and dreams that lie apart:
Dear little shrines that quiet hours may know!
Yet, now and then, as through the crumbling stakes,
A braver blossom thrusts its precious dole:
Some splendid deed the secret barrier breaks,
And wafts the sheltered fragrance of the soul.

The Sea-Going Peach Pie.

Two men on a ship-of-war were brought up before their superior officer for fighting. Both were badly battered.

The executive officer turned to the first man and said: "Well, my man, give me your side of this fight."

"I am a berth-deck cook by ratin', sir," answered the man. "Bill Trigger here, sir, is captain of the fo'castle, sir, and him and me is messmates, sir, and we goes into cahoots for to make a pie, sir, when we gets to sea. I being a cook, sir, agrees to make the pastry and do the cookin', while Bill agrees to get the can of peaches off'en the bumboat afore we leaves port, sir. Well, sir, he done it and I done it, and comes mess gear, I calls Bill to come and get his share o' the pie. Well, you see, sir, we be heeled considerable to the breeze, sir, and I has some trouble keepin' the pans in the galley stove, sir; but I makes the pie, sir, and calls Bill like I said. sir. Bill 'e comes, sir, and I takes my knife and cuts the pie fair down the 'midship line, sir. Well, then, sir, I sits down on my mess chest, sir, for to eat my pie, when Bill comes and hits me on the head, sir, and knocks my pie into the waterways, sir."

"Now, Trigger, what have you to say to this?" asked the officer.

Said Trigger: "Yes, sir, it's just like Jonesy said, sir; 'im and me goes into partners, sir, to make a pie when we gets clear o' land, sir, and our fresh grub is gone, sir. 'E bein' a cook, sir, agrees to make the casin', sir, and do the cookin', while I takes on to furnish the can o' peaches, it bein' a peach pie, sir. Well, sir, 'e makes the pie, sir, and calls me down at mess gear to get my 'alf and 'e takes a knife and cuts 'er fair fore and aft in two as near as may be; the ship bein' 'eeled over some, sir, just like 'e said, sir; and 'e goes and sits down on 'is mess chest, sir, to eat 'is piece o' pie, but blast 'is bloomin' eyes, sir, 'e gives me the weather side o' the pie and 'e gets all peaches, sir, 'er ballast 'avin' shifted on the galley stove, sir. So I 'ad to 'it him, sir."

George Washington Writes to the Church.

Among many facts of general historical interest brought to light by the preparations for celebrating the Centennial of the Missionary Society is the following note from George Washington.

When the General Convention of the newly established American Church met in 1789, it went on record as follows in regard to President Washington: "We most thankfully rejoice in the election of a civil ruler deservedly beloved and eminently distinguished among the friends of genuine religion, who has happily united a tender regard for other churches with an inviolable attachment to his own."

Washington, a communicant of old Christ Church, Philadelphia, replied, August 19, 1789:

"It would ill become me to conceal the joy I have felt in perceiving the fraternal affection which appears to increase every day among the friends of genuine religion. It affords edifying prospects, indeed, to see Christians of different denominations dwell together in more charity, and conduct themselves, in respect to each other, with a more Christian-like spirit than ever they have done in any former age, or in any other nation."—Exchange.

All Hallows' Eve. The frosty sunlight gleams
Through the high windows of the Castle Kirk,
Where in their shrine the holy relics lurk,
Waiting their resurrection, when the streams
Of festal pilgrims on the morn shall kneel
Adoring—skull of saint and martyr's thumb,
And many a charm from Palestine new come,
With potent spell body and soul to heal.

A knocking at the church door? Who is there?
Who breaks the charmed peace! What vandal dare
Disturb these blessed bones with evil intent?
A meagre monk nails up, for all to scan,
The Magna Charta of the soul of man—
"Our Lord and Master Jesus saith, Repent."
—A. T. W. S.

How common a thing is all learning, and all knowledge, and all eloquence; and how rare a thing is a little wisdom to direct them! How few men among our great men are wise men! Really wise men. How few among our own relations and friends are really wise men. If you have one wise man in your family, or in the whole circle of your friendship, grapple that man to your heart with a hook of gold.—A. Whyte.

For the Young Folks

We Never Know.

I spoke a word,
And no one heard;
I wrote a word,
And no one cared
Or seemed to heed;
But after half a score of years
It blossomed in a fragrant deed.
Preachers and teachers all are we—
Sowers of seeds unconsciously.
Our hearers are beyond our ken,
Yet all we give may come again
With usury of joy or pain.
We never know
To what one little word may grow.
See to it then that all your seeds
Be such as bring forth noble deeds.

Was the Knife Stolen?

A Story Founded On Fact.

On a hazy Indian summer afternoon an elderly gentleman was sitting in his easy chair, smoking his briar-root pipe, under the shade of a wide-spreading walnut tree, on the green lawn of his home. The mild influences of his surroundings had made him drowsy—his magazine had slipped from his hand, his pipe lay on the grass, and his chin rested on his breast. Soothed by the music of the breeze stirring through the leaves above him, he had passed from the nodding stage into gentle sleep. The distant lowing of the cows, the voices of men in the meadow, the crowing of the cock and the cackling of the barn-yard, helped by the enchantment of the soft atmosphere of the summer day had overcome him, and he was sound asleep.

Suddenly around the corner of the big white house appeared four laughing children, who, catching sight of Uncle Bob asleep, drew back in delight and began a hurried whispered conspiracy. Their plans were quickly formed. Tiptoeing, they stole silently on the unsuspecting sleeper. But the breaking of a twig aroused him, and peeping through a half-closed eye, he saw the children coming with straws in their hands to tickle him while he slept. He feigned deep sleep, and when they reached him and applied the ticklers he gave at first no sign of waking. And then suddenly, with a terrible snort, he seized them in his arms, and after the fashion of ogres, began to devour them, beginning with the smallest. But they knew Uncle Bob, and not one bit frightened, climbed on his knee and shouted "Story!" an old cry, always answered.

Four little children, wholesome, lovable, full of fun. There was Catherine, ten years old, with the gentle voice and the mother-heart. Then her sister Dorothy, seven, with French vivacity and keen wit. There were the two brothers, like as two peas, plump cheeks rosy as ripe apples, and bright eyes like little stars. Pallen, the older, six years old, blurting out everything and never thinking, till after he had spoken; John, five, quiet, gentle, always thinking first and speaking afterward.

Uncle Bob fought for time to think up another story, when all at once little John suggested it.

"Give me my knife!" cried he to Pallen.

"I haven't got your knife; this is mine," said Pallen.

"No, it's not; I saw it first," answered John.

"I don't care; I picked it up," grumbled Pallen.

Here Dorothy flashed out. "Stop fussing. You're both naughty." Then she turned to Uncle Bob. "Were you ever bad when you were young, Uncle Bob?"

"Of course not." said Catherine. "You ought to be ashamed to think of it."

"I bet he was," cried Pallen; "weren't you, Uncle Bob?"

Little John said nothing, but snuggled up to Uncle Bob, saying in that act, Bad or not, I stand by you. Then they all shouted, "Tell us about it," as though on second thought, they concluded, he had been naughty like other small folk.

Uncle Bob, without more ado, took the two older on his knees, with the younger cuddled in the hollow of his arms, and began.

"It's about a knife, I'm going to tell you." (Pallen and John looked at each other.) "I was a little boy, about your size, John, and a very sick little boy, too. Mother was giving me horrid medicines all night long, and I was so sick I thought I was going to die." ("I bet you didn't," broke in Pallen. "Of course he didn't," cried Dorothy. "But stop talking; let Uncle Bob go on.") "Well, in about a week the doctor said, 'He is about well. I will come once more and then he'll be all right. Give him three more doses out of this bottle, and he'll be up.' The doctor took out his knife, uncorked the bottle, laid both down, and hurriedly pulling on his gloves, went out.

"It was nearly dark, but I could see that pearl-handle, four-bladed knife; and oh! how I wished it was mine." ("Why didn't you grab it?" asked Pallen. "That would be stealing," said John. "Oh!" whispered Pallen; "I didn't think." "Do be quiet!" snapped Dorothy. "Go on, Uncle Bob.") "So night came on. Mother tucked me in, kissed me good-night, and went into the next room. Everybody in the house was asleep, except me. I couldn't sleep—I wanted that knife. And then I got up, crept to the window sill, caught the knife as if some one was watching me, and crept back to bed. I opened the four blades, rubbed the smooth handle against my cheek, and fell asleep with the knife under my pillow. Before daylight I woke up with a sudden awful fright. Something peered at me, out of the darkness, with green, boring eyes, and hissed, "Thief!" Something inside was clutching at my heart, whispering "Thief!" I was frightened nearly to death. I knew it was the knife—and I jumped up and put it back on the sill. I was a thief." ("No, you put it back," said John. Catherine, smoothing his hair, said, "Uncle Bob, you did not steal it.") "Yes, I was afraid I did. I was a thief half that night. I was keeping what was not mine, and I knew it. When I got in bed I felt better. I thought the doctor and mother need never know what I did. And then that thought began to make me miserable. I would, for the first time in my life, have a secret from mother. I was not only a thief, but I was a coward, unless I told them. I determined I would tell them, and I got up, put the knife under my pillow, and went to sleep, and slept sweetly until morning.

"When the doctor came the next morning he said, 'You are all right, my boy; I am not coming again. By the way, madam, did you see my knife? I left it somewhere, and can't remember anything about it.'

"'I will look for it,' answered my mother, 'but I am sure you did not leave it here, or I would have seen it.' Now came my time. 'Doctor,' said I, 'you left it here, and I stole it.' And then I told them all about it. 'Bless me! Bob, I never heard anything like that!' cried the doctor. 'Why did you not put it back and say nothing about it?' 'I couldn't, sir. If I had, I should have felt both a thief and a coward.' Atfer a moment's silence the doctor said, 'Shakespeare said (you don't kn w him, Bob), Conscience makes cowards of us all—but it has made a brave man of you. I'd trust you to the limit. You can't steal.'

"My children, that night I learned two things—first, 'to keep my hands from picking and stealing,' and second, 'never to covet and desire other men's goods.' Now run along and play."

And as they all walked away, Uncle Bob saw Pallen and John seriously talking together. He knew what they were talking about.

Invented by Accident.

An alchemist, experimenting in earths for making of crucibles, found that he had invented porcelain. A watchmaker's apprentice, holding a spectacle glass between his thumb and forefinger, noticed that through it the neighboring buildings appeared larger, and thus he discovered the adaptability of the lens to the telescope.

A Nuremberg glasscutter, by accident one day, dropped a little aquia fortis upon his spectacles. He found that this corroded and softened the glass, and he conceived the idea of etching. He drew figures upon the glass with varnish; applied the fluid and cut away the glass about the drawing. When he removed the varnish the figure appeared, raised on a dark ground.

The process of whitening sugar was never known until a hen walked through a clay puddle and then strayed into a sugar-house. Her tracks were left in the piles of sugar, and when it was noticed that the spots where she had stepped were whiter than the rest, the first step in the process of bleaching sugar with clay was taken.

The wife of an English papermaker one day dropped a blue bag into a vat of pulp. When the workmen saw the colored paper they were astonished, and their employer was so angry at the mischance that his wife did not dare to confess her part in bringing it about. The paper was stored for years as a damaged lot, and finally the manufacturer sent it to his agent in London and told him to try and get rid of it. Fashion at once marked it for her own. It was rapidly sold at a high price, and the manufacturers found it difficult to supply the great demand for colored paper.

Thus Dame Fortune looks out for her children, and when they are slow in learning useful secrets and possibilities, drops a word of advice in their way so plain that they cannot choose but read it.—Exchange.

A Furry Prophet.

When I was a small boy and used to pick cranberries on the cranberry bog, I was much more interested in the house on the marsh than I was in the berry-picking. So I would often leave my half-filled pail and steal away to see if I could get a glimpse of the shy little folks who lived in this house. When I was older I learned much about the muskrat house, for this was the dwelling of Mr. and Mrs. Muskrat, who are first cousins to Bill Beaver. That is why the muskrat is sometimes called the little beaver.

For its size there are few dwellings that contain so many inhabitants as does the muskrat house. When the snows at last settle down upon it in the early winter it contains three distinct sizes of young muskrats: there are the spring babies, who are now nearly grown, the summer children, who are helf grown, and the autumn babies, who are still quite small.

There is sometimes still another litter to make room for. As there are eight or ten in a litter, the size of the muskrat family can well be imagined. The old woman who lived in a shoe would certain have a fellow feeling for Mrs. Muskrat.

The phrase that one's family will eat him out of house and home is certainly true of the muskrat, for that is just what his family does. In the first place, the muskrat sees to it that every root and plant and grass fiber that goes into his house is edible. So this strange-looking house is both shelter and food. Thus it is that while the winter months go by, the shrewd muskrat literally eats his house down over his head. First he attacks the thicker walls, eating away at the inside, until by the spring it is but a veritable shell. He builds well; he means to have these walls last until the ice begins to break up so that he can procure new food.

This is why the muskrat is called a weather prophet. If the winter is to be hard and long, he makes his house larger, because he knows he will need more food.

A farmer living on the Connecticut River early one morning discovered a muskrat neighbor swimming for an island in the middle of the river dragging a large tobacco plant after him in the water. Out of curiosity the farmer secured a boat and went over to the island, where he found half a dozen plants of the same brand nicely worked into the cunning rat's house. So for a part of that winter at least that muskrat family had chewed tobacco!

It is lucky for the muskrat family that there are plenty of them, otherwise guns and traps would soon make an end to an animal that makes such a brave showing at the furrier's. When dyed a rich, dark brown, he is known to the trade as "French seal." The honor he claims of being the only member of his tribe to wear marketable fur makes him a marked animal. —Selected.

"New Hymns Among Our Favorites"

"After using the New Hymnal for a year in St. Mark's, Denver, we are convinced of its value and enthusiastic about its virtues. The congregation has learned to sing through having the music in hand. We are gradually getting acquainted with hymns that we never knew before, and some of the new hymns are already among our favorites."

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

The Sunday School of Christ Church, Savannah (the Rev. John D. Wing, D. D., rector), reopened for the fall session on Sunday, October 9, in its beautifully remodeled school. The entire basement of the church, which was a gloomy, inadequate room, has undergone a complete transformation, and has been divided into individual class-rooms. The walls and woodwork are painted cream white, indirect lights give sufficient light in the inside rooms, and a new system of ventilating provides fresh air every three minutes. On the north side there is a small chapel, with sliding partitions, that is used for the Primary Department, and the south side, also with sliding partitions, is part of the space for the Junior Department. As it now stands, Christ Church has the finest arranged and best esuipped Sunday school in the city. The Christian Nurture Series was installed last year, and this month the week-day session will be organized under the Church School Service League.

St. Paul's Church, Albany (the Rev. John Moore Walker, rector), has also made progress in its Sunday school. The Christian Nurture Series has been put in this year, and a choir has recently been organized. Plans for the Church School Service League are now under way, and the week-day session will soon be a regular part of the Church school life.

Bishop Manning Issues a Call for Prayer.

In response to the proclamation of President Harding, Bishop Manning has issued a call to the 400 clergy of the Diocese for a special service in all the churches under his jurisdiction on Armistice Day, November 11.

The service will consist of prayers for those who gave their lives in the World War, and for the success of the Conference on the Limitation of Armament, at Washington. Special provision is made in the form prepared and issued for the service for the two minutes of silent prayer called for by the President

The Bishop is himself to speak in Madison Square on Armistice Day at a meeting planned by the Merchants' Association, the Masonic orders, the City Club, Knights of Columbus, American Legion, Elks—in all thirty organizations. Similar united meetings are planned for other cities on Armistice Day.

Anniversary of Woman's Auxiliary Observed.

In all New York churches the fiftieth anniversary of the Woman's Auxiliary was observed on October 16 or on dates near to it. St. Bartholomew's, St. Thomas', Trinity, Intercession and others had corporate celebrations, numbers to receive running into the thousands in all. The offerings were for the Emery Fund, and were generous. All branches held meetings within the octave. Histories of the Auxiliary in New York parishes were given in many branches. It was agreed that never were branches in better shape for work, or ever doing more than now.

McGuire: Entered into life eternal on the evening of October 6, at his home in Richmond, Va., WILLIAM EDWARD McGUIRE, son of William David McGuire and Nancy Moss McGuire.

"Now abideth faith, hope and love, and the greatest of these is love."

IN LOVING AND GRATEFUL MEMORY.

October 17, 1921.

Three times the queenly roses,
Three times the lilies pale,
Have budded and bloomed and faded,
Since she passed beyond the veil.

Three times the willows have whitened,
And the golden-rod, tall and bright,
Has three times lost its riches
Since she has gained the light.

But the dear and tender memory
Of a life so brave and true
Fades not with summer roses
Nor darkens with skies of blue.

And like a star shines the promise—
The promise sure and blest,
"Who giveth his life shall find it,"
And find a joyful rest.

IN MEMORIAM.

MARY CHANNING MOORE GOODE was the daughter of John Goode and Anne Leftwich, of Bedford County, Va., great-granddaughter of General Joel Leftwich, and sister of the late Hon. John Goode, of Bedford and Norfolk, Va.

As All Saints' Day approaches our memories linger, especially, with those who, one short year ago, "still lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow—loved and were loved," but now are "lost awhile," until, the night being gone, the smile of their "angel faces" shall be always with us.

The first day of November, when our church dwells on the thought of the "Communion of Saints," was also the birthday, seventy-six years ago, of the subject of this sketch.

Born midway among a family of thirteen children, all of whom she survived, those lessons of self-denial and courage were early learned which served her so well through a long and useful life.

Trained to be a teacher, at Stuart Hall, Staunton, Va., her after years were mostly spent in Kentucky, Arkansas, North Carolina, Bedford, and finally in Lynchburg, Va. Distinguishing traits were her unselfish devotion to her family, her abiding interest in all children and young people, her keen sense of humor, and her unswerving loyalty to the church of her childhood, when "St. Stephen's," in Bedford County, was blessed by the ministrations of Rev. Richard Wilmer, afterwards the well-known Bishop of Alabama.

An exceptionally pious mother saw that as many as possible of the thirteen children were in their places each Sunday morning, which meant a drive of seven miles over uncertain mountain highways. The Apostolic Succession and a literal Bible were early taught the members of that little congregation, and seemed as unchanging as the everlasting hills of the Blue Ridge under whose shadow the most of them lived and died.

Named for Bishop Moore, this true soldier of the Church seemed always to try to live up to her inheritance, and her devotion found most happy expression in Lynchburg, as a member of St. John's. Not only was she most useful to her pastor and beloved friend, Rev. G. Floyd Rogers, but her interest through him was extended to the "Boys' Home" at Covington. Her small estate was left to that institution, and its chapel holds a tablet inscribed to her memory.

Her latter years were clouded by much physical suffering, which she bore with fortitude, sustained by the sympathy of many relatives and friends.

Nothing could have been more beautiful than the manner of her death on Christmas night, 1920. She seemed unusually well, and as she had often done before, went to help make the season's brightness at the home of her rector, to whose wife and children she was especially devoted. Saturday, Christmas Day, was spent in church attendance and fireside pleasures. She went to bed declaring it had been the happiest of her life, and with the words on her lips, "Call me in time for Sunday school."

In the words of Mr. Rogers at her funeral, "God called her," for when her room was entered, a few hours after, she seemed to be sleeping peacefully, but her spirit had winged its flight. Mr. Rogers wrote later to one of her relatives, "I loved Miss Channing and called her 'my bishop.' She was of the kind who go almost on a level with the kingdom of heaven." M. G. B.

PAUL TRAPIER HAYNE.

"Friend, Go Up Higher."

It is with a conviction of his exaltation, but also was a sense of deep personal loss, that every one of us who knew him think of the death of our friend and fellow-worker in Christ, MR. P. T. HAYNE.

Born in Charleston, S. C., 1846, Mr. Hayne came to Greenville, S. C., in 1872. From that time until his death, September 14, his life was one of rich usefulness to humanity. A man of sterling integrity, scrupulous sense of duty, high courage and earnest faith, he gave himself unfailingly to every Christian responsibility. In all of his relationships of life, husband, father, citizen, business man and friend, he held the highest ideals and lived up to them.

It was, however, as an ardent and devoted Churchman that he is best known by us. Mr. Hayne was the oldest member of the vestry, both in point of age and service. His heart and soul were in the work of the Church, and he gave fully of his time and means to further its progress. It was his to know and experience some of the struggles and hopes of the earlier years of this parish and his part has been no small one in its continuous upbuilding. For forty-one years he was a vestryman; for thirty years the treasurer of the parish; a frequent delegate to diocesan conventions, and a regular and faithful worshipper and communicant. He was one of the best-informed laymen, not only in this parish, but in the Diocese.

His death is a severe blow to the Church and this community. His judgment, ripened through years of experience, will be missed by the rector and his co-workers, but joyfully and hopefully we enter into the rich heritage which he leaves us as he is lifted to his higher plane of service.

Let us thank God that He shared with us for so long a time this life of loyal service, and pray Him that He will continue to raise up among us such men as Paul Trapier Hayne, whose names shall be perpetuated throughout all generations and their good deeds accepted through the merits of our Lord Jesus Christ. CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

ERIE.

Rev. J. C. Ward, D. D., Bishop.

Meeting of Archdeaconry of Ridgway.

The Archdeaconry of Ridgway met in Trinity Memorial Church, Warren. This yearly meeting was more than usually interesting because Bishop Ward was present and took part. At the first evening service the second Bishop of Erie gave the address, which was a request for co-operation in all his work as diocesan chieftain.

The next day the Bishop and Dr. Radcliffe and the rector of the parish celebrated the Holy Communion. At 9 A. M. the Rev. Messrs. E. H. Edson, C. S. Kitchen and C. A. Brown conducted Morning Prayer, at which Archdeacon Aigner gave a brief outline of the history of the Diocese since its inception. After service the missionary clergy, including the two Archdeacons, reported on missionary work in the Diocese. At noon special prayers were recited by all present.

Dinner was served about 12:30, after which the Rev. G. W. Matthews. M. A., made an able address, and the Rev. E. H. Edson read a fine paper on "Eternal Life."

A the evening service an address was made by the Rev. A. W. S. Garden on the success of the N.-W. C. and how the money was spent.

After service the first evening Bishop Ward held a reception in the parish house, which was largely attended.

The Archdeaconry of Meadville held its autumn meeting in St. James' Church, Titusville, the Rev. Albert Broadhurst, rector, on October 10 and 11, and opened with a business session at 2:30, Bishop Ward presiding. The annual election resulted in the election of the Rev. Walter H. Du Moulin as secretary and the re-election of Mr. William K. Achert as treasurer. A greeting with a message of regret because of his enforced absence was received from the Rev. William W. Ridgeway, the former secretary. Reports of missionary work were made by the Archdeacon and the Rev. Messrs. Albert Broadhurst, William P. Kemper, W. J. Williams. A. W. S. Garden, and the Rev. Dr. Reilly. The Archdeaconry then went into a Nation-Wide Campaign conference, with the Rev. A. W. S. Garden, Diocesan Secretary of the Nation-Wide Campaign, as the leader. In the absence of Rev. Edward J. Owen, his paper on "The Use of Wine in the Holy Communion" was read by the rector of the parish. After Evening Prayer a brief address on the Nation-Wide Campaign was made by the Executive Secretary, and the preacher of the evening was the Bishop of the Diocese. The Bishop was the celebrant at the service on Tuesday morning, and was assisted by the Archdeacon and the rector of the parish. The congregation at these services was exceptionally large, inasmuch as it was Bishop Ward's first visit to the parish. The morning session was opened with a discussion of the use of wine in the Holy Communion. The book review was presented by the Rev. Mortimer S. Ashton, the subject being, "Dr. Beckwith's Book on the Book of Revelation." Miss Grumbine, speaking for the Board of Religious Education, presented a paper on the "Church School Service League." The pleasure of this meeting of the Archdeaconry was greatly enhanced by a parish reception to the Bishop and clergy of the Archdeaconry. As St. James', Titusville, is equipped with a moving picture machine, two films were shown, of the profession of the Bishops at the General Convention, Detroit, and the procession of the clergy and Bishops at Grace Church, Buffalo, at the time of the consecration of Bishop-elect Ward.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Giles B. Palmer, rector of Meade Memorial Church, White Post, Va., has accepted the call recently extended him to St. Stephen's Church, Westhampton, Richmond, Va., in succession to the Rev. James D. Gibson, who has taken charge of Trinity Church, Covington, Ky. Mr. Palmer expects to take up his new duties December 1, and it is hoped he may be able to hold services on Thanksgiving Day.

The Rev. Frederick Constantine Stevens has resigned as minister in charge of St. Alban's Mission, Diocese of Long Island, to accept the rectorship of St. Mark's Church, Adelpi Street, Brooklyn, in the same Diocese.

The Rev. Dr. W. T. Allan, priest in charge of Coleman and Ballinger, in the District of North Texas, is at the Ione Hotel, Guthrie, Okla., under the charge of a physician for an infected foot. Dr. Allan has resigned his charges, to take effect December 1, after having been in active service for nearly forty-three years. His address is Hotel Ione, Guthrie, Okla.

The Rev. Henry Davies has resigned as rector of Christ Church, Easton, Md.

Archdeacon George T. Lascelle, rector of St. Matthew's Church, Sunbury, Pa., has resigned his parish, effective November 15. He is to take charge of missions in Allegheny County, in the Diocese of Western New York. With two assistants he will care for three parishes and two missions.

The Rev. George W. Hurlbutt has been appointed by Bishop Brown minister in charge of Weddell Memorial Church, Fulton, and the Church of the Messiah, Highland Springs, Richmond, Va., in successsion to the Rev. W. S. Shacklette, who resigned recently to take charge of Rivanna Parish, Fluvanna County. Mr. Hurlbutt, who has been serving the churches at Remington and Cassanoca, has already entered upon his new work.

The Rev. K. L. Houlder, having resigned the work at Deming, N. M., to take work at Havana, Cuba, the Bishop has appointed the Rev. H. R. Remsen, of Port Lavaca, Tex., to succeed him. He is expected to take charge in November.

The Rev. Harold E. Schwaus has been relieved of the care of St. James' Church, Exchange, Pa., and is in charge of All Saints', Selins Grove. His address is Milton, Pa.

The Rev. R. B. Templeton, dean of Trinity Cathedral, Little Rock, Ark., has accepted a call to Holy Trinity Church, Gainesville. Fla. Mr. Templeton has been dean of the Cathedral for five years, during which time the communicant list has more than doubled, and more than eleven thousand dollars has been expended for improvements and the payment of debts.

The Rev. A. J. G. Dowie is in charge of the Church of the Holy Spirit, Gallup, N. M. This church building was erected many years ago, as a memorial to Bishop Bedell, of Ohio. Owing to many changes in the population, the mission has been vacant much of the time. New people now make a better congregation, and the Sunday school is larger than ever before.

Rev. R. Bancroft Whipple has been placed in charge of St. James' Church, Exchange, Pa., and is in residence there.

Ordinations.

On St. Matthew's Day, at the Italian Chapel of San Salvatore, Broome Street, New York (the Rev. Henry J. Chieva, vicar), the Rt. Rev. Arthur S. Lloyd, D. D., advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Joseph Anthony Racioppi, B. A. The Rev. Chauncey C. Kennedy preached the sermon. The Rev. Thomas J. Lacey, the presenter, united with Canon Nelson and the Rev. L. Ernest Sunderland in the laying on of hands. Seventeen clergymen were present, including several Italian missionaries. Mr. Racioppi is about to engage in missionary work among Italians in Bridgeport, Conn.

E. J. Reefer Dept. 6537
9th and Spruce Streets, Philadelphia, Pa.
(Additional pictures sent free on request)

Observe These Rules:

1. Any man, woman, girl, or boy living in America but residing outside of Philadelphia, who is not an employe or relative of an employe of E. J. Reefer may submit an answer. It costs nothing to try.

2. All answers must be mailed by post office closing time, Dec. 10, 1921.

3. All lists of names should be written on one side of the paper only and numbered numerically, such as 1, 2, 3. Write your full name and address on each page in the upper right hand corner. If you desire to write anything else, use a separate sheet.

4. Only such words as appear in the English dictionary will be counted. Do not use obsolete words. Where the plural is used the singular cannot be counted and vice-versa.

5. Words of the same spelling can be used only once, even though used to designate different objects or articles, or parts of objects or articles. An object or article can be named only once.

6 Do not use compound words, nor any words formed by the combination of two or more complete English words, where each word in itself is an object.

7. The answer having the largest and nearest correct list of names of visible objects and articles shown in the picture that begin with the letter "L" will be awarded first prize, etc. Neatness, style, or handwriting have no bearing upon deciding the winner.

8. Candidates may co-operate in answering the puzzle, but only one prize will be awarded to any one household; nor will prizes be awarded to more than one of any group outside of the family where two or more have been working together.

9. There will be three independent judges, having no connection with E. J. Reefer, who will judge the answers submitted and award the prizes at the end of the contest, and participants agree to accept the decision of the judges as final and conclusive.

10. All answers will receive the same consideration regardless of whether or not an order for Reefer's "More Eggs" is sent.

11. The announcement of the prize winners and the list of words will be printed at the close of the contest and a copy mailed to every person sending an order for "More Eggs".

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Any number of people will believe that the Ruler of the universe has something to do with an earthquake or a volcano; it is hard for us to believe that He controls the bloom of a peach tree, or the recovery of a little child.—J. H. Eccleston.

The ultimate truth in man is not in his intellect or in his possessions; it is in his illuminaton of mind, in his radiation of sympathy, in his recognition of this world not merely as a storehouse of power, but as a habitation of man's spirit, with its eternal music of beauty and inner light of the Divine Presence.—Tagore.

Give thy heart's best treasure,
From fair nature learn;
Give thy love, and ask not,
Wait not a return;
And the more thou spendest,
From thy little store,
With a double bounty
God will give thee more.

St. Luke on nine occasions directs attention to the prayers of Jesus—after severe labors; before the choosing of the apostles; before Peter's great confession; at His transfiguration; for Peter, in Gethsemane; for His murderers; and at the moment of death. His first prayer that we hear of was at His baptism.—Farrar.

It was the Phariseee, whose standard of all things was the Pharisee, who thanked God that he was not as other men. But the poor publican, with his God-touched conscience, and his vision of the splendor and purity of heaven, could only cry, "God be merciful to me the sinner." With such heights to scale, and with such depths to loathe, it was impossible to despise the sorriest brother.—G. H. Morrison.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., NOVEMBER 5, 1921. No. 45

AN INVITATION TO ALL OUR READERS

The Southern Churchman belongs not only to its editors, but to its readers also. It is a very old institution, rooted in deep and rich traditions, and drawing the best promise of its fruitfulness for today and tomorrow from the continued loyalty and good will of those into whose homes it goes. Very truly we want this whole big fellowship to realize that we are all sharers together in the life and work of the paper. We want to know what our readers are thinking about the Southern Churchman. We want to know what they like and do not like in its pages. We want the fresh suggestion of their ideas to make plain to us the paths of larger development.

Therefore, we are asking all our readers to send us their opinions on three questions about the paper; and, in order to indicate the real value which we attach to their answers, the Southern Churchman offers prizes for the best, the second best and the third best suggestions which shall be sent us—twenty-five dollars, fifteen dollars and ten dollars respectively.

The questions are these:

1. What feature of the Southern Churchman do you like best, and why?

2. What feature of the Southern Churchman do you like least, and why?

3. What feature not now contained in the Southern Churchman would you most like to see added?

There are no restrictions upon this invitation, nor upon eligibility for the prizes. The lists are open to subscribers and non-subscribers alike, but of course those who are regular readers of the paper will be in the best position to give helpful answers. The only conditions are these:

That the answer to any one question be not more than one hundred and fifty words.

That all answers be written on only one side of the paper.

That preferably they shall be typewritten, or if this is not practicable, that they be written by hand very plainly.

The invitation is open for the months of November and December, closing December 31. From time to time we may print some of the answers received. Prizes will be awarded to the most helpful answers as soon as possible after January 1.

"GO TO CHURCH" ON ARMISTICE SUNDAY

We commend and endorse most warmly this message from the widely known student and publicist, Mr. William T. Ellis, of Philadelphia:

"At bed rock, the idea behind the Disarmament Conference, which opens in Washington on Armistice Day, is spiritual and derived from the Bible. All the world is viewing with interest and expectancy this epochal gathering; but Christians have a peculiar concern in it.

"It scarcely needs the call of the Federal Council of Churches to make Armistice Sunday a day of prayer for the conference, and a time of special consideration of the spiritual issues involved. It only remains to assure the full value and import of this Sunday wherein the Church will find her voice upon one of the greatest of universal problems. How can the message of the Christian faith best be brought to bear upon the conference and upon the world?

"Washington, with all that it will then contain, is directly subject and sensitive to American public opinion. Did democracy ever before have such an opportunity? For the serious-minded citizens who make up the membership of the churches, and all the other countless folk who share the common solicitude of this hour, have it within their power to bring the noblest ideals of human relationships to bear directly upon the conference.

"How is this to be done?

"Easily and simply and normally.

"First, every religious congregation in the land should determine to make the services of November 6 times of grave significance. They should be vocal with the real mind of the Church. The burden of this solemn day should be laid squarely upon the shoulders of every person present. The intercession for Divine guidance upon the conference should be more than a formal pulpit petition: it should be the prayers of a people who are sincerely aroused.

"Obviously, this should, by every practicable means, be made a general 'Go-to-Church' Sunday. If ever the presence of the whole community within dedicated walls is important, this is the time. As a public duty, people should be led to the houses of worship on November 6. Then, if any voice is given to the common aspirations of the hour, it will be representative of the will of the community.

"There should be preliminary agitation and preparation for this day. All the churches of a city or town should be in agreement upon the major items of the day's program. In connection with the special publicity for Armistice Sunday—of which there should be much—a display advertisement should be published in all the local newspapers.

"This advertisement should serve several purposes: that of calling attention to spiritual significance of the Disarmament Conference; of showing the Church's relation thereto; of urging general public attendance upon the services of November 6; of quickening interest in and respect for the Church; and of intimating to the church members their responsibility upon the occasion.

"If there is adequate statesmanship in the Church, as well as in the nations, it is to be expected that the Disarmament Conference will mark the inauguration of a new and more Christian era in the relations of the peoples of earth and in the progress of civilization."

FOR THOSE WHO DARE BELIEVE

"Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." So spoke Isaiah long ago. To the men of his time, that prophecy must have seemed like madness. The world shook to the tread of the Assyrians, marching in one brutal conquest after another across the nations in their path. So, in the centuries since, still the prophecy has seemed a forlorn and empty dream. In the face of the hope that nations should not learn war any more, the long succession of an almost endless strife has flung the taunt of its contradiction. Yet, nevertheless, a deep instinct in all men of faith has made them feel as, generation by generation, they read the prophet's words, that he was right in a great, far sense, which time should vindicate. His eyes were on the horizon of God's future, and above the darkness should climb at length the day.

The most significant spiritual fact in our own time in regard to war is the increase of the conviction that, in spite of every contrary appearance, the end of wars may be brought near. There are many cynical forces in our world which give this hope deliberate denial. These forces will be present when the conference meets in Washington. There will come the weariness of the Old World, the disillusionment of nations calloused by the loss and slaughter, and, worse than that, the cheap cynicism of men in this New World who, for partisan ends, sneer at the possibility of avoiding war, whose price they never paid. But there is in America a great, quiet force of different sentiment, a force that wells from the instinct of the plain people, that gathers in the spiritual reservoirs of the churches—the force of a conscience and will that can prevail.

Men are determined to see to it that some real effort be made to prevent wars, because they have begun to realize, as men never similarly could realize before, the hideous cost of the last one. We remember that ten millions of men lost their lives in battle, the very flower of the race. We look at the staggering figures which tell us that this last war cost the world $186,000,000,000, more than eight times the cost of all the wars in the entire century preceding. We know, furthermore, that out of the unprecedented taxation to which the citizens of this country are now subjected, over 92 per cent. goes to pay the cost of wars already fought or wars prepared for.

In the second place, men are determined that something shall be done toward the prevention of war, because the very imagination recoils from what another would be like. We have advanced to a point where there could never be any non-combatants any more. War now is not the affair of a small fraction of the population. It lays its hand immediately on every living being in a country, women and children as well as men. The development of airplanes, the bombing of cities from the air, the use of poison gas—heard of at first with incredulous horror, as an unspeakable barbarity which the Germans had been guilty of—and now adopted as a matter of course by military strategists—the prediction by military staffs that another war will see the deliberate and wholesale use of disease germs to exterminate whole populations—these things make us know that, unless there is force enough of sanity to put an end to war, civilization must inevitably perish.

But, over and above these tangible considerations, there is another which more particularly concerns the churches. People with a Christianized conscience understand that war is destructive of all the values which Christians are striving for. It fills the world with hate and bitterness. It creates an atmosphere which stifles the ideals of the kingdom of God.

Therefore, for every reason of responsibility to man and to God, it is the duty of the Christian people to make their public opinion count in the conference at Washington which, if it succeeds, may lead our world on to ampler hopes, and if it fails, will surely doom it to the deadliest of pessimism and competitive hate.

What, then, are some of the considerations which Christian public opinion must bring to bear upon the conference?

Let us set down three:

First, we must declare that nations, as well as individuals, are subject to the unchanging moral law of God. No nation, however rich in resources, can commit the sin of arrogance and selfishness, except to its own ultimate undoing. There are certain moods which cloak themselves under the name of patriotism which are nothing less than devilish. To inculcate the idea that it is a citizen's business to advance his own nation's interest, or to justify its claims when these are morally indefensible, is to turn patriotism into dishonor. We in America have got to require of ourselves the same self-discipline of spirit which we should expect of other peoples. We must insist that our own representatives go into the conference with clean hearts and clean hands, asking nothing which we would not expect another nation to demand in the same circumstances—considering the rights, the sensibilities, the needs of other peoples as justly as our own.

In the second place, we must remember that a Christian nation has a peculiar responsibility in its international relationships. There are some, of course, who deny that America, as a nation, is Christian, but it rests with the power of Christian men and women to prove that it can be such. The ideals of the kingdom of Christ as He preached them are to be like leaven pervading everything. Christian public opinion of today must determine that the gap shall be bridged between the ideals which people confess in their worship on Sundays and the principles which, as a nation, they follow. We must expect and, therefore, secure that American representatives in the Washington conference shall bear themselves toward other peoples as representatives of a nation which confesses the ideals of Jesus, which believes in the greatness of service, which thinks in terms of humanaity, and not alone of nationalism, which believes in and seeks to build up the brotherhood of man.

Last of all, we must understand that the destiny of our world depends upon the efficacy of our faith. Our greatest danger is the irresponsibility of unbelief, the dead, careless fatalism of those who talk cheaply about great catastrophes and, by the familiarity of their talking, make them possible. When men talk about the necessity of a war with Japan, or the possibility of a war with England, and accustom others to think that such iniquities may come true, they are paralyzing the nerve of moral effort. They are making themselves guilty of the blood and agony that may come. Against such cheap talk, and cheaper fatalism, there must be today the marshaling of religious faith. We must believe that the nations can prevent wars, because every motive of sanity and reason combines to strengthen the religious protest against a world at war.

The conference must not adjourn until there is secured a drastic limitation of national armaments, and until there is created some organized method of adjusting peaceably and beforehand those differences which lead to war. We stand at the cross-roads of destiny. We can lead the race forward, out of the old morass, if the will and conscience of all the people make imperative for their leaders the demand that they shall build a way.

CREATIVE CARING

Margaret Prescott Montague

IS there vitality enough in the world to make the Disarmament Conference a real success? Do enough of us care hard enough for peace to bring about some means for its advancement?

No progress is ever made without a tremendous amount of red-hot vitality and desire on the part of some one individual human being, or of a group together. The question is, How much of that kind of vitality can be depended upon now, and is it hot enough to insure some lasting results from the Washington meeting? How many of us care passionately for peace, and take a flaming interest in the conference? From 1914 to 1918 people cared passionately to fight and kill other members of the race, with the successful result that millions of young men died horribly, and millions more were crippled for life; old men and women were driven away from their homes: beautiful and historic buildings were destroyed; half the world was ruined, and uncounted numbers of children died of pestilence and famine, and are still so dying. That was the successful result when a good many people cared to have a war. Is there as much sentiment now for peace as there was in certain quarters for war before 1914? And are the horrors of the past few years sufficiently stamped upon our minds to make us ardently desire to avert such another cataclysm? Or are we already beginning to forget? I said that uncounted numbers of children died, but though we did not count them, I hope the Recording Angel did, and that his record will be handed to every one of us as we enter the next world, and the question asked, Did you care enough that these children died to generate a strong sentiment for peace so that such an outrage may never happen to humanity again?" And if we answer, "No, peace was no concern of ours, it was the business of the powers that be, we couldn't help starving children and a ruined world," then I hope we shall be burned in hell for our indifference. Oh, I do not mean eternal punishment, but at least enough torture so that should we ever be incarnated in the world again we will bring with us a tremendous horror of war and a consuming passion for peace.

It is indifference, and laziness, and paleness of caring that is the curse of humanity. If humanity really wants disarmament, humanity can have it. But if it does not want it, or peace in some form, and want it very hard indeed, it will get war again, and that extremely soon. War again? Why, of course we shall get war again, and in the very near future, if we do not care ardently to prevent it. I was fooled once. Before 1914 I said to myself civilization is now too well established ever to be wrecked again by widespread wars. And when in 1914 the insanity began, I thought it couldn't possibly keep up, that it would all be over in a few weeks or months at most. And plenty of other people thought the same. We said, "People don't get together in large masses to kill one another and continue to do it for any length of time—that sort of thing simply isn't done any more." But it was done, and it continued to be done with the utmost thoroughness for days and months and years. And now you don't fool me again. I know that humanity tips over into the madness, tragedy and stupidity of war with lightening-like quickness. I know also that after the next war, with all the complete inventions that we now have for slaughter and ruin, that not so much as twelve baskets full of the fragments of civilization will be left to gather up, and we human beings shall have fought ourselves to death like the Kilkenny cats, presenting a spectacle of such colossal stupidity that there are no words in any language strong enough to express it. And if such an infinite idiocy comes to pass it will be your fault and mine. Oh, no! It won't be the fault of some remote statesman; we can't shrug it off on to their shoulders; it will be the fault of the every-day people of the world like ourselves; people who are too busy going to movies, running around in flivvers, or ruminating, or chewing gum, or in any other way carrying out our usual occupation to give a hand's breadth of creative caring to prevent such a catastrophe. Oh, no doubt when it happens we shall shriek to high heaven, blame fate and Providence and say that Christianity has broken down, and all the other silly things that have been said before. Nevertheless, there will be nobody really to blame for it but our very selves. The question is squarely before each one of us—Do we want war, or do we want peace? If humanity desires peace, and desires it hard enough, humanity can have peace. But if it does not want it, and want it hard, and want it now, so that the Disarmament Conference will feel a strong enough sentiment at its back really to accomplish something, then it won't get peace, and it most certainly will get war.

We human beings are not dumb-driven cattle that have to take anything that comes to us, whether we like it or not. We sometimes prefer to think we are, because we are frightfully lazy about making a creative effort, and it is much easier and more restful to collapse supinely and blame fate for all our misfortunes, than to use the God-given faculty which we all possess to get rid of them. Oh, I do not mean that any one of us working all alone can set himself or herself free of any affliction—though I suspect we can come much nearer doing so than most of us think—but I do most earnestly believe that if a large enough portion of humanity cares hard enough and long enough to accomplish anything, that thing will be accomplished. It is collective and creative caring that brings salvation.

All of which is somewhat like saying that if you pick up a guinea-pig by his tail his eyes will drop out. He has no tail, and therefore it is impossible to pick him up by it. If we care enough we can bring things about, but if we have no capacity for caring, how can we do anything? This brings us back again to the opening question—Is there enough vitality in the world at present to make the Disarmament Conference a real success?

That question, it seems to me, chiefly concerns the people of the United States, for the simple reason that to care passionately for anything requires a great deal of vivacity, and as we have been less exhausted by war than the European nations, we are the one country at present that should be most rich in that divine quality of creative caring.

It is the amount of interest that you and I as American citizens put into it that is going to make the success of the Disarmament Conference. If we, as average people, shrug off all responsibility, and say, "Oh, let George do it," whether by that we mean Lloyd George, King George, St. George, or any of our own common or garden American Georges, why then not much will come from the conference, no matter how big the men are who attend it. The next war will be upon us soon again, and those little boys who are going to school now will be engulfed by it and very likely killed or maimed for life. But if you and I, the average people—John Smith, Mrs. Smith, Miss Smith and young Master Smith—throw now the whole weight of our vivid desire on the side of disarmament, why then we may have the honor and glory of rendering a service to our generation, the next generation, and the whole of humanity forever. We shall in all probability not be known individually for anything that we do, but we shall be the ones to whom future generations will point back and say gratefully, "Yes, it was the people of 1921 who, by their passionate desire, helped to bring the peace into the world which we now enjoy."

The Christian admits the necessity of conflict. And more than this, he accepts the duty of aggression. It is a duty. We think indeed too commonly of ourselves rather than of God, and so it happens that as Christians we habitually take up the attitude of defense rather than that of attack. We come to think of our faith as something which is exposed to countless assaults, even losses. We are almost contented to be let alone. Yet conviction must be aggressive. That which we enjoy is available for all men. It is entrusted to us that we may bring it to all men. We have a gospel to announce. And the soul which is awakened to the vast sorrows and the vast possibilities of life will still, I believe, as in old times, recognize it as the answer to its inarticulate cry. Meanwhile, at any rate, he who bears the message in this confidence will realize in glad experience that he is not charged to withstand only, but to conquer, not only to keep an anxious guard over inherited treasures, but to win new powers within him and without him for Christ's dominion and his own wider ministry.—Bishop Westcott.

Not believing God's word about prayer, we cease from it or restrain it. In the first instance, prayer was instinctive. If we believe God's words, we can pray. If we believe them cordially, we can pray earnestly. If we believe them but feebly, we pray faintly. If we do not believe them at all, we cease from prayer; and it is most instructive and interesting to observe how, as faith declines, dumbness in prayer creeps over us.—S. Martin.

FAR EASTERN PROBLEMS AND THE CONFERENCE ON LIMITATIONS OF ARMAMENT

By Dr. Sidney L. Gulick

THERE are two primary problems in the Far East—China and Japan. They are somewhat complicated by the needs and ambitions of European powers. There must be a free and frank discussion of them at the International Conference on the Limitation of Armament if a real reduction is to be brought about.

China's problems include such matters as the "Shantung question." She has made multitudinous treaties granting to many western nations and to Japan "special rights," "concessions" and "interests." Her administrative impotence has led foreign nations to assume control of the "customs," of the salt taxes and other necessities. By treaties her tariff rates are fixed by foreign governments. There are several foreign settlements with rights of extra-territoriality for the various nationalities. Foreign soldiers and police, British, French, American and Japanese, are found in a number of strategic places. And then there is the difficulty of establishing a national government. There are really two governments in China today.

Japan's problems are of a wholly different kind. In 1868 she began vigorously to adjust herself to the industrial, commercial and militaristic system of the modern world. By 1905 she had extricated herself from the clutches of Europe's aggressive ambitions. Her adoption of modern science, education, governmental methods and laws, medicine, hygiene, ideals of the sacredness of human life has produced a new Japan, vigorous, able, ambitious, rapidly growing in population, and well acquainted with the world and its ways. In self-protection she adopted the militarism and diplomacy of Europe.

Japan is now becoming a great industrial nation. Her population is larger than she can well support. She possesses only slight natural resources and is now dependent for her living and her industry, for food and raw material brought from China and Siberia and bought by goods sold to China and Siberia. Japan has been anxiously asking how she can insure a government in China that will guarantee to her uninterrupted and unhampered trade. And Japan has her viewpoint about the "Shantung question.' '

Japan is a proud nation and sensitive to insult or humiliation. The refusal of several countries to give her people in their lands the same treatment granted to other foreigners is a matter of keen concern.

America also has her Pacific and Far Eastern problem. American traders find the doors of opportunity in East Asia not so free and open as they desire. They find obnoxious Japanese competition and Japanese methods. Along with European merchants and Chinese patriots they look upon Japan's rising power and expansion with apprehension. They are appealing to the American Government for protection for the "rights" of trade—for insistence on the "open door."

The American Government is apprehensive of Japan's rising naval power. It is a possible threat to the safety of the Philippines, Guam and the Hawaiian Islands, and possibly even to the Pacific Coast. Due to these apprehensions powerful fortifications and naval bases have been developed on the coast and far across the Pacific Ocean.

The American people, particularly on the Pacific Coast, fear a flood of Japanese immigration. Some are insisting that first by "peaceful penetration" and later by military power Japan plans to annex our Western States to her expanding empire.

These are many thorny problems. How can they possibly be solved? Are not the demands of each race and people absolutely incompatible?

Here are ten things that Americans and Japanese and Chinese should always remember:

1. The problems are real and serious. They cannot be solved by preparations and threats of war, nor even by war.

2. The cost and the damage of war would be far greater than any profits of trade even to the victor. A very short war between America and Japan would cost America vastly more than the net profits of a generation or a century of trade with China.

3. A decisive war between America and Japan is almost impossible in these modern days. Japan might perhaps capture the Philippines and Gaum—but she could not possibly venture to attack us thousands of miles from her home base. We might defend the Philippines, but we could not attack her thousands of miles from our home base. It would be impossible for the two countries to come to grips.

4. The beginning of a war between America and Japan would be the signal to Japan's forces to seize and dominate East Asia. She would inevitably do this in order to guarantee her nation's food supplies and raw material. The nation would at once be turned into a vast camp for making war material and munitions.

5. War between America and Japan, even for the altruistic purpose of serving China, would thus be the surest way of subjecting China to Japan's immediate military domination.

6. There is, however, not the slightest probability that America will ever attack Japan either for purposes of maintaining trade rights or in the interest of humanity and justice for China.

A SEVEN-POINT POLICY FOR THE SETTLEMENT OF THE FAR EAST SITUATION.

1. That America and Japan reduce their navies.
2. Let them declare they have no plans for war.
3. America and Japan should agree to a treaty of arbitration.
4. Japanese liberalism must overthrow Japanese militarism.
5. America must secure agreements with England, France, Japan and other countries for a common policy of friendship and goodwill in dealing with China.
6. China must be left to develop her own governmental system.
7. Nations must agree to prevent mass emigration from one country to another.

7. A growing American navy in the Pacific with powerful naval bases will serve to arouse false hopes and expectations in China and to cause needless fears and suspicions in Japan. It would inevitably create a correspondingly strong navy in Japan—one deemed sufficient to repel any possible attack.

8. A growing Japanese navy on the other hand—with battleships able to cross the Pacific and back again without recoaling—will cause needless fears and suspicions in America. It would also inevitably create a corresponding navy in America. Its possessions would make Japan more feared and suspected and hated in every land, and especially in China, and would tend powerfully also to beget the bully spirit and the bully practice by its possessor.

9. A system of competitive armaments thus, between two or more nations, does not really protect. It only weakens the nation by wasting their income and diverting it into unprotective uses.

10. In some way the militaristic spirit, the natural tendency to rely on brute force to get one's desires, must be overcome, whether in Japan or in America. It cannot be overcome by force or by threats of force. They have just the opposite effect. The military spirit and preparations for war in one country create the military and beget war preparations in neighbor nations. Suspicion begets suspicion; battleships generate opposing battleships—an inevitable disastrous and ruinous vicious circle.

How can this vicious circle be broken? How save China? How protect our rights and our trade? How break down and overthrow Japan's militarism, which if successful would be a menace to the whole world?

If it cannot be done by force, can it be done at all? China can be saved, our rights can be preserved, and Japan herself can be saved.

An American policy that can do this and the only policy that can do it is a policy of real friendship for both China and Japan. If America is out for its own selfish desires in the Pacific to be secured by force and threats of force it will in the end defeat its own interests. By being a real friend to China and Japan, it will secure in fact its own best interests.

What, then, is the policy which America should adopt at the coming conference in Washington? In broad outlines, the situation may be summed up in seven points:

1. Let America and Japan agree at once to make a real positive reduction in their sea power.

2. Let them declare to each other and to the world that they have no plans whatever for war. This single step carried out would remove at once mutual suspicions and fears, break the vicious circle and make possible fruitful negotiations about every other thorny question.

3. Let America and Japan promptly negotiate and ratify a treaty to submit to arbitration every question whatsoever which they cannot promptly solve by their common diplomatic procedures. This would go still further in removing fears and rumors of war and in promoting mutual confidence and goodwill.

4. Let America trust Japanese liberalism to overthrow her entrenched militarism. If militarism in Japan can be shown to have no real grounds for existence, if the people of Japan learn that they have no cause whatever for fear of attack or humiliation by the nations of Europe and America, Japanese militarism cannot and will not long continue.

5. Let America take immediate steps to secure agreements with England, France, Japan and other interested countries for a common policy of friendship and goodwill in dealing with China. It is a proposal that China shall no longer be regarded by any country as a happy hunting ground for special economic and territorial rights. This is not a proposal for intervention in China. China's officials should not be allowed by the nations to sell China's birthrights to any foreign government, banking corporation or special interests, playing off one nation or interest against another.

6. China must of course be left to develop her own governmental system and establish her own institutions. If she does this she will be able herself to resist outside encroachments.

7. The nations might well also make international agreements that mass emigration from one country into another will not be asked or permitted, except in the case of those countries that specifically desire and arrange for it.

But the nations should also mutually agree to grant equality of race treatment for the individuals of each nation temporarily or permanently residing under their respective jurisdictions.

A policy of friendship, mutual trust and goodwill such as this promptly adopted by the conference would remove the most difficult obstacles from the pathway and enable it to deal in detail with every question that will come before it.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE CONFERENCE ON THE LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS

By Hamilton Holt

ALTERNATIVES BEFORE THE CONFERENCE.

To reduce armarment to the lowest point consistent with national security, or

To offset some proportional limitation of the naval force of Britain, Japan and the United States.

Intelligent public opinion must assert itself if the largest results are to be obtained.

THE significance of the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments depends on whether the conference will make a real attempt to reach the goal of reducing armaments "to the lowest point consistent with national security" or whether it will content itself merely with trying to effect some proportional limitation of the naval forces of Britain, Japan and the United States.

The former can be done if Mr. Harding is prepared either to enter the existing League of Nations, or to set up a new association of nations. The latter can be done simply by a joint agreement between the three greatest naval powers of Europe, America and Asia. The latter is the alternative more than likely to happen. If this be the correct surmise, then President Harding is dead right in warning the public not to entertain too high hopes of results from the forthcoming conference.

The people are keyed up to a high pitch of anticipation. They are undoubtedly ready to follow the President to the limit in any concrete peace proposal he may make just as they were ready to follow Mr. Wilson into the League of Nations two years ago. But partisan politics beat Wilson, and partisan politics may now beat Harding.

Still there is real danger confronting the conference. It is the danger of putting the cart before the horse. To limit armaments without setting up anything to take the place of armaments is not practicable.

The only two forces that ever have or probably ever can govern mankind, whether as individuals or as nations, are law or war, right or might, reason or power. If we do not have one we must have the other. Nations, therefore, must depend upon armaments as instruments of power until they are ready to provide acceptable substitutes. And the method by which this can be done is, first, political organization, for from political organization comes law, from law comes justice, and from justice comes peace.

President Harding has indeed made tentative suggestions regarding a possible Association of Nations which will be the first step in the orderly process of establishing law for war. Although he refused to enter the existing League of Nations, he does desire to secure more or less limitation or armament.

What can we expect, then, from President Harding? If he can do no more than prevail upon Britain and Japan to join with us in some proportional cutting down of navies, even in the smallest degree, he will deserve the thanks of all good men everywhere and will have achieved a real triumph of statesmanship. Such a result, however, will, of course, be hardly more than a scratching of the surface of the disarmament problem, but the people are not likely to be satisfied with so slight a result. Millions of men died in the great war, because European statesmanship had gone bankrupt. They taxed themselves to pay three hundred and fifty-five billion dollars because Austria would not heed Serbia's appeal to let the Hague Court settle their dispute.

The nation-wide interest of the religious forces of the country, as illustrated by the educational program by the Federal Council of the Churches, is a striking manifestation of the popular demand for a thorough-going reduction of armament. This alone will the people heartily support. But if they are actually to secure such a reduction in armaments they must voice that desire unmistakably in every city, town and district in our country.

Maryland Mass Meeting Urges Disarmament

Dr. Freeman Stirs Large Audience; Results of N.-W. C. Praised.

The Diocese of Maryland rallied its people in a mass meeting Sunday night, October 23, in Baltimore to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of the missionary organization of the Church and to stimulate interest in the closing months of the second year of the Nation-Wide Campaign.

The Rev. Dr. James E. Freeman was the speaker. One hundred per cent. loyalty to Christ's Kingdom and to the Master and Leader of that Kingdom was the note of his message.

The present administration of the Church's work, he declared, would stand the scrutiny of any modern business organization. If there is any failure of accomplishment it is because church members have not sufficiently realized the importance of the King's business to give it all the financial support it should have.

The strongest position of Dr. Freeman's speech, which in the estimate of your correspondent was one of the strongest and most effective he has ever heard from him, was the appeal to the imagination in presenting the possibility of Christianity's influence in world affairs at this time. He quoted world known personalities who had affirmed that it was not diplomacy nor statesmanship that the world needed most today, but more of Christianity. The most ardent optimist must admit that there has been a slump in American life since Armistice Day, 1918. But pessimism was not necessary because world facts are depressing. We have a faith and should have a vision. Men are hoping for the realization of that faith and vision. The Nation-Wide Campaign has presented that vision to the Church. It is not a three-year spasm. It is the beginning of a new era in the Church. Never before has there been realized such a sense of solidarity in the Church. No hint of partisanship can be raised in connection with disbursing missionary funds. No question of Churchmanship is raised in the sessions of the Executive Council. Is the man doing the Lord's work? That only is asked.

At the conclusion of the meeting attended by 1,200 people, Judge Harlan presented a resolution on disarmament drawn up by Mr. Joseph Packard, Chancellor of the Diocese and veteran in the Church's Councils.

The resolution, after asking divine guidance for the coming conference, looked not only to disarmament and peaceful settlement of international differences, but also desired the removal as far as possible of whatever tends to stimulate or foster the spirit of militarism.

Inspiring Meeting of the Province of the Southwest

The sixth annual Synod of the Province of the Southwest opened its sessions October 19 in St. Peter's Church, St. Louis, Mo., with a celebration of the Holy Communion at 9:30 A. M. Celebrant, the Rt. Rev. Daniel Sylvester Tuttle, D. D., Presiding Bishop and President of the Synod, assisted by the Bishops of West Texas and Kansas. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of Oklahoma.

Meeting for organization, Bishop Tuttle in the chair, the delegates listened to words of welcome from the venerable chairman. In the absence of the Bishop of Arkansas, the response was made by the Bishop of Texas.

The Ven. John A. Chapin, of Oklahoma City, was elected secretary, and announced the appointment as assistant secretary of the Rev. L. B. Richards, of San Antonio, Tex. The Rt. Rev. D. S. Tuttle, D. D., was elected President of the Synod by unanimous vote. Mr. C. L. Johnson, Waco, Tex., was elected Treasurer of the Synod.

The principal matter of business before the Synod centered about the relations of the province to the general organization of the Church. The Synod adopted a resolution tendering to the Presiding Bishop and Council its provincial organization for such service as it may be able to perform in the making of surveys, programs and budgets, relating to the work of the general Church in this province.

This action was taken in consideration of the policy of the Presiding Bishop and Council in not maintaining the offices of provincial secretaries. Much discussion centered about the future of the provincial system, its reason for being, and the ways and means by which the provincial system might be recognized and become a real factor in the organized life of the Church.

Resolutions were adopted in appreciation of the services rendered by the Rev. A. W. S. Garden, retiring Provincial Secretary, now Executive Secretary of the Diocese of Erie.

The Synod undertook to raise the salary of Bishop Demby, Suffragan Bishop of Arkansas for colored work.

The Rev. Z. B. T. Phillips, D. D., of St. Peter's Church, St. Louis, Mo., was elected a member of the Presiding Bishop and Council, representing the Seventh Province.

The Rev. W. H. Ziegler, of Albuquerque, N. M., told the Synod of the acquisition by the Church in New Mexico of a sanatorium for tuberculosis patients, a well-equipped institution in Albuquerque, henceforth to be known as St. John's Sanatorium.

A report of the work of St. Phillip's Industrial and Normal School for Colored Girls in San Antonio, Tex., was presented by Miss Bowden, the principal. This school is the leading work for colored people conducted by the Church in the Seventh Province, and is also under the oversight of the American Institute for Negroes. An exhibit and sale of handiwork was maintained through the time of the Synod.

The Synod adopted resolutions on the recent death of Major P. K. Roots, father of the Bishop of Hankow, and long a devoted layman of the Diocese of Arkansas.

The outstanding features of the Synod were the inspiring addresses given by men and women, clergymen and laymen, on the mission of the Church. Particularly noteworthy was the Church's Task in Higher Education, by the Rev. William E. Gardner, D. D., Executive Secretary of the Department of Religious Education. Akin to this topic, a most valuable discussion ensued on the Young Man in the University and the Call to the Ministry, led by the Rev. Dr. Phillips, of St. Louis, and the Rev. W. P. Witsell.

The meetings of the women of the province, now fully organized in the Church Service League, brought before the delegates present the wide scope of woman's work in the Church today. Topics such as these were taken up: National Policies of the Woman's Auxiliary, by Mrs. Loaring Clark, of Chattanooga; The Supply Department, by Mrs. Wade, the National Supply Secretary; The United Thank Offering, by Mrs. O. B. Cobb, Ardmore, Okla.; Devotional Aspects of the Woman's Auxiliary, by Mrs. C. B. McDonald, of St. Louis; Daughters of the King, by Mrs. G. B. Kerwin, of West Texas; The Church Periodical Club, by Mrs. John G. Hoyt, of St. Louis; The Guild of St. Barnabas, by Miss M. A. Gillis, of St. Louis, and the Girls' Friendly Society, by Mrs. James A. Seddon, Provincial Secretary G. F. S.

The Synod closed on Friday with a parting word of cheer and thanksgiving from the President of the Synod, for the fifty years of service of the Woman's Auxiliary, and for the one hundred years of accomplishment through the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society.

Student Volunteer Movement

Since the inauguration of this Movement among college students 8,742 student volunteers have sailed for foreign missionary fields from the United States and Canada. Five hundred and ninety-five of these went out during the year 1920, a far greater number than during any previous year. They represent seventy-four different missionary societies.

Among other results the movement is making a large contribution towards missionary education. During the year 271 institutions reported 781 classes in Mission Study, with 19,289 men and women enrolled. These are thus trained both to pray and to give for missions, and last year these students contributed $240,550 to the cause through regular agencies. It is further claimed, and no doubt with truth, that the Movement is making a large contribution, not only to the spiritual life, but to the intellectual outlook of our educational institutions; creating a world consciousness and a wider interest in the world's affairs and developing an international sympathy to counteract the influence of a narrow and selfish nationalism. The success of Christian missions serves also as a powerful apologetic for Christianity. The Movement is active in about one thousand schools, colleges and universities. It asks the intercessions of God's people that He would send forth laborers into His harvest.

Jesus Christ was very familiar with the problem of the maladjustment of His followers. He was more burdened about this than any other problem. If you have never read the gospels through with this in mind, try to do it. You will find Jesus Christ was more concerned about getting His followers to understand one another and love one another, especially when it was difficult, especially when they differed, especially when they criticized each other, especially when ignorance and passion dominated, than any other one problem. He was burdened, and His solution was strikingly original. He went to His knees, and He offered His great high-priestly prayer at the heart of which was the petition that they all may be one, proving by act as well as by precept that it is a super-human process; that not until our hearts are flooded with the love of God shed there by the Holy Ghost will be cast out selfishness and jealousy and confess our sins singly and collectively and go His way.—John R. Mott.

The China for Christ Movement. Letter From a Chinese Clergyman

The following letter from one of the Chinese clergy of the Diocese of Anking has been received by the Rev. Lloyd R. Craighill. Mr. Craighill is being retained in this country on extended furlough in an effort to secure much needed buildings for the work in Nanchang:

Dear Mr. Craighill:

Since you left China we have been thinking and talking of you very often and wishing you a real success in doing something in America for the work in Nanchang. At our Diocesan Synod this year I met Mr. Kimber Den, who told me that of the ninety pledges which we got during the meetings of the China for Christ Movement in November last year, some thirty people have been coming to church for worship and the study of the doctrine. Among them one man, who wrote me a complimentary letter while I was there, has also led some of his friends to come to church.

This year the Bishop again appoints me to the secretaryship of the China for Christ Movement, and I have suggested to him that in order to make the movement more efficient and forceful in its activities, one has to give his whole time towards the work. He agrees with me in this point and is thinking of the proposition.

As for anything that can be called an immediate and concrete result of the C. F. C. Movement in my own station in Nanling, I should like to tell you that soon after the launching of the movement the Christians put themselves in actual social service in starting a free school for the poor boys. It began with fourteen children, and now there are over thirty who are having a free education with books, uniforms and all found. This year they have spent some $60 for the uniforms, besides what has been spent for books, fifes and drums. We shall have to spend $50 more to pay a regular teacher for half of his time in the school. The rest of the time is taken up by three young men as voluntary teachers. Among them is one non-Christian who gives, in addition to his time, $20 per year for the support of the school. He now comes to the church regularly and heartily appreciates the spiritual motive in rendering such good service as Christian education to the poor. I know that there are many others who, like this young man, are of a noble disposition and anxious to be good and do good. It is the business of the Church to supply the right motive, not so much by argument, but by enlisting them in some kind of work like this free school where they soon find a living faith in Christ and with it the blessing that Almighty God has vouchsafed to all His children seeking after and loving the truth.

Last year, after the completion of the church and clergy house, our Nanling Christians thought they ought to do something to show their gratitude towards the mother Church in America. They considered the matter a good deal and finally came to the conclusion that the church ought to be furnished with a proper bell to call the people to worship. They realized that the Church in America had no other motive in giving them such a beautiful church building than that of leading them on to worship God. Hence they collected among themselves $100, which sum I have handed over to Mr. Lund. The object is to buy a bell made in America which will have a wider range of sound and will not be confused with the many bells of the city. I wonder if I can trouble you to buy one and bring it out with you. It will give you some trouble, I know, but if you would make a point of it to secure the bell, even if you have to send as freight, I shall appreciate it very much indeed.

With many thanks in advance and best regards to Mrs. Craighill and yourself, I am, most sincerely yours,

P. LINDEL TSEN.

Problems Facing the Church in Cuba

The Latin mode of thought, manner of living, and attitude toward religion are so different from those of the people of the United States that in order to secure any results at all it will be imperatively necessary to produce a native Cuban ministry. This end can be attained only by bringing Cuban boys from their earliest years into close and intimate contact with teachers who should be clergymen or laymen of the Church.

For this reason the Cathedral Day and Boarding School for Boys, at present located in Marianao, a suburb of Havana, represents the most important work of the Church in Cuba. It is under the direction of the Rev. P. H. Asheton-Martin, a most able educator, to whose assistance have been brought for the current year the Rev. Manning L. Patillo from Philadelphia, and Mr. Angel Ferro, an ex-Roman priest who has been acting as lay reader during the past year in the pueblo of Santa Cruz dei Norte, and who will teach Spanish in the school.

The temporary use of an old Spanish mansion in Marianao has been obtained for the school, with the adjacent lot for a playground, at a yearly rental, fairly reasonable for Cuba, but extremely high for the United States.

The crying need in Cuba is for permanent buildings, thus to avoid the fearful waste of money in exorbitant rents, and to convey the idea of permanency in our work to Cuban minds. The cheap wooden shacks in which our services are held in many places make a most unfavorable impression upon the Cuban mind as to the dignity and glory of our Church; the rentals paid for those which we do not own would in a few years suffice to build solid, beautiful and dignified churches; while the rents which have to be paid for the houses in which the clergy live are so high that it is almost impossible for the clergy to provide for their personal daily needs.

For such reasons the Bishop of Cuba is most desirous of raising sufficient funds for the purchase or the erection of a proper building for the School for Boys. The Methodists have been wise in their generation and have built Candler College, which is full to overflowing, and it is reported that they have purchased a most desirable site in Cienfuegos for another large school; and it is also reported that the Baptists have determined to devote several hundred thousands of dollars for the erection and endowment of a large school building in La Vibora, Havana. And wherever we have done the same, i. e., built worthy churches, the results have been sure and ample: witness the Cathedral in Havana in which not only has been developed a splendid congregation of English-speaking people, but its location, size and dignity and beauty have made it a landmark of our Church to all Havana. Witness also the splendid work being accomplished in Guantanamo made possible by the erection of the beautiful church, the gift of the late Mr. W. W. Frazer, of Philadelphia, and now by the addition of the new school building by gifts and appropriations from the North; the unusual work at Los Arabos, where a Cuban deacon baptizes over a hundred children every year; the good work done in Jesus del Monte, Havana, where we own the building in which the services are held and the minister lives; the good, steady work accomplished yearly in Matanzas, where the same conditions prevail; while there are many good works being accomplished in other parts of Cuba, where the buildings have been inadequate and unworthy, they have been accomplished in spite of conditions and not aided by them. Mention should be made also of the work on the Isle of Pines, where the indefatigable minister who has succeeded in more than holding his own in the face of a dwindling population, has been very materially aided in this by the fact that we have four fairly good church edifices and a rectory on the Island.

SHANTUNG THREATENED BY A FAMINE.

Shantung, China, one of the vital problems before the Conference on Armament Limitation, is now threatened by a famine which may extend to all of the eastern provinces of the republic, according to a letter from Rt. Rev. F. R. Graves, D. D., Bishop of Shanghai, which has just been received by Dr. John Wood, Secretary of the Department of Missions of the Episcopal Church. Bishop Graves was chairman of the International Commission which had charge of relief in the recent famine in North China. Writing from Shanghai under date of September 15, Bishop Graves says:

"There is every likelihood that the coming winter is going to be a very difficult one. The famine in the north is over; but though they have record crops up there, the trouble has broken out in a new place. There have been very heavy floods in Shantung, Anhui, Kiangsu and Chekiang, and large portions of the country are under water with a total loss of crops; and even in the southern part of the province, where famine is practically unknown, the people are reported to have lost one-half to three-fourths of this year's crop, and the rain still continues. I fully expect to see the Famine Commission functioning again by the first of November, when the distress will begin to be felt, so that there will be plenty of use for relief funds."

Bishop Graves reports that a total of $4,000,000 passed through the hands of the International Commission on Famine last February, of which "every cent went into relief."

Practical Action

A Congregation Calls for Disarmament.

Trinity Parish, St. Charles, Mo., is setting a fine example for Christian congregations throughout the country, by taking practical and definite action to create public sentiment to bring pressure to bear upon the coming Conference at Washington for the Limitation of Armaments.

If the example of this parish were followed throughout the country such a deluge of urgent resolutions would pour into Washington that there would be no mistaking the sentiments of the people in the United States with regard to this great movement.

On October 21, 1921, the congregation of Trinity Parish, St. Charles, Mo., the Rev. B. E. Reed, rector, duly assembled, formally and unanimously adopted the following:

"Whereas, the frightful horrors of the late war—in extent and atrocity unexcelled in the history of the world—have involved all nations in a whirlpool of agony, confusion and utter bankruptcy, and

Whereas, a war following this would exceed in frightfulness the one just, nominally, ended, and

Whereas, preparation for war is incitement to war, and preparation for peace is incitement to peace:

Therefore be it resolved: That in the interests of humanity, for the protection of our own country, and the security of our own families, we, the congregation of Trinity Parish, do earnestly pray the administration of the government of our country, to throw its powerful influence for the largest disarmament that is compatible with safety, and

Resolved further, that the conference of nations, in all matters affecting their interests, be opened for the world to hear as is their due.

The meeting ordered this action to be forwarded to the President, the Secretary of State, and the Commission of the League.

Open-Air Pageant

Missionary Centennial Display in the Grounds of the Church Where Washington Worshipped.

Christ Church, Alexandria, Va., though looking backward to the days of George Washington, is nevertheless looking forward as well, and keeping well abreast of the times, as is evidenced by a pageant rendered there last month.

The setting was ideal for such a scene in the old church yard. From the upper windows of the church streamed forth a flood of light, illuminating the tops of the trees, while nearer the earth gleamed forth the electric lights that shone like stars in the darkness. Such a number of them there were that it seemed like the milky way itself. A platform in front of the church was illuminated by electric lights from the top of a cross, and the full moon shed a gentle radiance over all.

The three voices were represented by the rectors in Alexandria, the Rev. Messrs. Morton (rector of the church), Carpenter and Hall, who took their places on the platform in the foreground. The Greek Church was also present in the person of the Rev. Thomas Daniels, pastor of the Orthodox Greek Church. Sts. Constantine and Helen were also impersonated by Mr. Ginolopolis and the Rev. Dr. Samuel Wallis, in appropriate costumes. After these three took their position the choir came out and occupied one side of the platform.

The service then began, and gradually the nations of the world drew near irresistably attracted by the great white cross that was the central figure of the whole pageant. The parts were wonderfully well taken, the Indians, the mountaineers, the Japanese and the Chinese, the Turks, the Esquimos, Spaniards, Mexicans, immigrants and all the other nations were most faithfully and accurately costumed, all were drawn to the cross and each group knelt down before it. A squad of the Light Infantry advanced following the other groups and saluted the cross, then later when the Sanctus was sung they knelt with the others. As the service progressed the voices of the clergy and the familiar hymns held the audience in a quiet reverential frame of mind. The recital by Dr. Morton of this past century of missionary effort brought the story vividly again of those whose life work had been consecrated to missions, and it was a record to inspire.

The pageant closed with the clergy leading, then the white robed angels, each carrying a cluster of ascension lilies, then the choir singing "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," with all the nations following.

It was a glorious triumphant pageant, and from an artistic point of view a great success, but from a spiritual viewpoint its success lies in its stimulating power to fight on as soldiers of the cross and to help establish the kingdom of God throughout the world. The heroes of the past one hundred years are calling in no uncertain tone, "Take up our quarrel with the foe, to you from falling hand we throw the torch, be yours the task to raise it high." Shall we fail them?

An Interesting Accession to the Church

Announcement was made last week at the Church Missions House, headquarters of the Episcopal Church in the United States, of the affiliation to that Church of nearly the entire membership of the Eastern classis or deanery of the Hungarian Reformed Church in America, aggregating a membership of 15,000, distributed among twelve congregations in the Eastern States. Under an agreement entered into at a conference at Princeton, N. J., last Wednesday, this body of Hungarian churchmen, upon formal ratification of the Princeton Concordat, by the separate congregations, nine of which have already acted, will be admitted into full privileges in the Episcopal Communion under the pastoral direction of the bishops in the diocese where the Hungarian congregations are now located.

The announcement is expected to awaken deep interest in religious circles of all denominations; not alone because of the strength of the Hungarian Reformed Church; but more especially because the movement into the Episcopal Church has been prompted by the declaration of the Lambeth Conference on Church Unity, is in direct line with these recommendations, and is the first practical step toward Church unity that has been taken since these Lambeth recommendations were promulgated.

The agreement of union entered into at Princeton on Wednesday is between the parishes and missions of the Hungarian Reformed Church concerned, and the bishops of the dioceses in which the former are located, and the Presiding Bishop and Council, or executive body, of the Episcopal Church. These dioceses, and the bishops presiding over them, all but two of whom attended the Princeton conference, held in Nassau Hall, as the guests of Bishop Matthews, are as follows: Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop of Bethlehem; Rt. Rev. Philip M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop of Pennsylvania; Rt. Rev. William T. Manning, D. D., Bishop of New York; Rt. Rev. Edwin Stevens Lines, D. D., Bishop of Newark; Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, D. D., Bishop of New Jersey; Rt. Rev. Robert Carter Jett, D. D., Bishop of Southwestern Virginia; Rt. Rev. Chauncey B. Brewster, D. D., Bishop of Connecticut, and Rt. Rev. James H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop of Harrisburg. All the bishops present signed the concordat, with Rev. L. Nanassy, D. D., dean of the Eastern Classis of the Hungarian Church, and clerical and lay delegates from nine of the twelve congregations representing parishes in Perth Amboy, New Brunswick, South River, Trenton, Roebling, Woodbridge and Franklin, N. J., Philadelphia, Kreischerville, Staten Island, Bridgeport, Conn., and Phoenixville and Bethlehem, Pa. Bishops Manning and Brewster were not present, but Bishop Manning has since added his signature.

Participating in the conference, in addition to the Church representatives named, were Robert H. Gardiner, Secretary of the Commission on Church Faith and Order of the Episcopal Church; J. Wilson Bayard, Esq., Chancellor of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, and an authority on Ecclesiastical Law, who drew up the concordat; Rev. Thomas Burgess and Rev. Chauncey Emhardt, Ph. D., Secretary and Field Director of the Foreign-Born Americans, Division of the Council of the Episcopal Church, and Rev. W. Northey Jones, Secretary of the Conference and rector of St. Peter's Church at Perth Amboy, with whom and Dr. Nanassy the project for the union originated.

Acting with them, the officials of the Foreign-Born Americans Division have handled the details of the transaction, an essential feature of which is a broad plan of Americanization, since one of the objects of the Hungarians in joining the Episcopal Communion is fully to identify themselves with an absolutely American institution.

At Wednesday's conference, at which Bishop Talbot, of Bethlehem, presided, all the details of the concordat were carefully discussed and agreed upon. There is no intention on the part of the Episcopal Church to absorb the Hungarian Church, but rather to permit it to retain its entity as an organization with the right to preserve its forms, to retain title to all of its property, to continue its own deanery, while at the same time the congregations will place themselves under the pastoral care of the Episcopal bishops in whose dioceses they are located, and conform to such rules and laws of the Episcopal Church as are fundamental. The clergy will receive additional ordination at the hands of the bishops.

The Reformed Church of Hungary, of which the Eastern Classis was a branch, dates back to the time of the Reformation.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor.

HOPE AND PRAY.

There are some who have had high hopes of great results from the International Conference at Washington who feel discouraged because President Harding has made it clear that the first object of the discussion is not to disarm, but to limit the amount of arming that nations shall do, by some plan of international agreement.

The fact that the end in view is, for the time being, more negative than positive need not dishearten us. If we can begin with a limitation of arms, ultimate disarmament is almost certain to follow, because the first step will have been taken, namely, the preservation of peace through voluntary agreement between the nations rather than by preparation for war.

So distinguished a military authority as General Frederick Maurice, of England, has made the suggestion through a magazine article that a sort of proportionate basis for the size of an army might be taken from the provisions of the Versailles Treaty, which allows to Germany a regular armed force of 100,000 men.

Taking this number in proportion to area and population, a ratio could be worked out which would at least afford a starting point for practical discussion.

The rearrangement of naval preparedness would be much more difficult because so many things besides area and population will have to be considered.

The difficulties are very great in all directions, but it is surely God's work, and if Christian people throughout the country will continue to pray and hope, something will surely be brought about for the bringing in of His Kingdom.

We should let nothing discourage us, but remember always that His way to make Joseph a ruler in Egypt was to send him into the country a penniless slave boy. His way to bring salvation to the world was to allow His Son to die the death of a criminal on the cross, so whatever turn of affairs may take place in Washington during the coming month, let us continue to pray and to hope.

In one of our large Southern cities a great mass meeting has already been planned for the afternoon of November 6, in which all Christian people are to take part. It is devoutly to be hoped that such meetings will be held in many places and that a great voice of petition will go up from all over the land to ask His guidance on the momentous occasion that is approaching. Such gatherings held on every Sunday afternoon throughout the conference would undoubtedly be of great advantage, both for the opportunity of united prayer and to show to delegates what devout people hope and expect from them.

CO-OPERATE TO PREVENT SUFFERING.

Conditions throughout the country this year are such that it is only by the closest co-operation, both of individuals and organizations in welfare work, that acute suffering can be prevented.

This is fall house-cleaning time; when the home-maker goes through the packing chests, clothes closets, etc., taking inventory of the clothing. The most promising possibilities are sent to the modiste or cleaner, and by a process of elimination there are several bundles classified something like this: Barely possible, outgrown, hopelessly passe. Won't you remember that although you may have subscribed and helped the Associated Charities and other organizations to put food and fuel into poverty-stricken homes, that the eternal question—wherewithal shall they be clothed—could be answered for many families by one or all of these bundles?

There is an especial need at this time for men's clothing—shoes, trousers, coats and overcoats. Have you, Mr. Busy Business Man, a suit, a questionable 1920 model, put away where moths and rust corrupt and saved for a rainy day? That proverbial rainy day has come with revengence to hundreds and hundreds of jobless, heart-sick and shabby men in Richmond. School children must be warmly and neatly clad to insure regular attendance and progress. Under-nourished babies have to stay in stuffy cook-rooms and disregard doctors' and visiting nurses' orders for fresh air and fall sunshine for want of flannels and wraps. Old quilts and blankets are most acceptable. In fact, everything of that sort can be utilized. Even old clothes, which seem beyond the pale of wearability, can be sold for old rags and the proceeds used to equip an elderly, sick woman going to Catawba.

It would stimulate the imagination and sense of humor, and tug at the heart-strings of our sometimes apologetic donors of miscellaneous packages to see their cast-off clothing twisted and turned and transformed into "something new and strange." A school smock for small sister Susie is evolved from some prosperous papa's pajamas, and as brother Ben's best bib and tucker, your debutante daughter would never recognize her dowdy dress of last year's vintage.

In the desolate home of a delicate widow and three small children, with no means of support, a lovely little flaxon-haired girl is eager to go to Sunday school. Her mother is too proud to send her in shabby clothes, but has somehow contrived to get together a suitable wardrobe—minus the hat. This the visitor promised to provide from our store-room. As she left, the little girl, with normal vanity and an innate love of the beautiful, in spite of her sordid surroundings, threw her arms about the visitor's neck and lispingly whispered, "Please, won't you let my new hat have some flowers on it." A little velvet poke bonnet was found, but, alas, it boasted only of a tailored band! Back in the corner of the shelf a box of artificial flowers came to light and solved the problem. Prim little posies were tacked on at intervals, and the effect would have shocked the sensitive soul of an artistic milliner, but that child's delight and gratitude, shared by a whole admiring family, was a scene long to be remembered. The visitor wished that the little girl who wore that bonnet probably two years ago, and the woman who hesitated to send those trivial odds and ends, could have been "among those present at the presentation."

This unprecedented unemployment situation has increased our problems and responsibilities, and the co-operation of interested individuals is most necessary. Right here we wish to urge you to help us to help the unfortunate to help themselves. This you can do very materially by 'phoning to the City Employment Bureau or the Associated Charities when you can give an odd job or use your influence to secure either permanent or temporary employment for worthy working people registered with us.

If you have plain sewing to be done in the near future, call up the Associated Charities now and get the names and addresses of needy women who cannot leave home and children, and are constantly applying to us for that kind of work.

We have used here the title "Associated Charities" because it is the name by which most people recognize relief organizations. In many places, however, such bodies are recognizing the importance of eliminating the word charity and using "welfare" or "relief."

The main thing is for everybody who has anything they can spare in the way of clothing to get it to those who have not, through whatever channels there are in the community, whether such channels are known as Associated Charities, Family Welfare Organization or General Relief Society.

Church Intelligence

Philadelphia Church to be University Chapel.

No Change in Headquarters of Holy Apostles' Parish: Other Notes of Interest.

The Church of the Transfiguration has been turned over to the trustees of the Diocese of Pennsylvania for work among the students of the University. The jubilee services were in charge of the Rev. John R. Hart, Jr., who is Episcopalian chaplain at the University. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Arthur Holmes, of Drake University, Chicago, and former professor of the University. He took for his text, "Spiritual Limitations."

A part of the services consisted of the reading of the report of the Supervising Committee which was presented to the congregation March 29, 1875. This report was read by Colonel S. A. Bonaffon, Jr., a charter member of the church.

The church was closed during the summer and thoroughly renovated and fitted for all the activities to be carried on there. It was used this year for the first time as a college chapel, and the experiments proved sufficiently successful to create much enthusiasm among the students, culminating in their desire to take over the management and arraange for every phase of Church work that has been found successful anywhere among students in this country. Five students have been granted licenses as lay readers to assist Mr. Hart in carrying on the services.

The congregation of the Church of the Holy Apostles, Twenty-first and Christian Streets, Philadelphia, defeated a proposal to make the Chapel of the Mediator, Fifty-first and Spruce Streets, headquarters for the Holy Apostles' Parish. The Rev. Dr. Toop, the rector, presided at the meeting in the administration house, which was filled with members, who heard addresses by Bishop Suffragan Garland, the Rev. George Herbert Toop, rector, J. Wilson Bayard, Chancellor of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, and others.

The vote was two hundred and thirty-four against changing headquarters and eighty for the change. The defeat of the project was greeted with applause, after which Mrs. George C. Thomas, widow of the founder of the parish, moved the vote be made unanimous.

The proposal to change was based on the contention that many communicants had moved from the vicinity of Holy Apostles' Church to West Philadelphia.

It was decided to obtain a new vicar of the Chapel of the Mediator to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Rev. Philips E. Osgood, who left to take the rectorship of St. Mark's Church, Minneapolis.

Sunday School Institute: Ministers, Sunday school teachers and parish workers attended the annual Sunday School Institute which was held in St. James' Church, Philadelphia. The Rev. L. N. Caley, D. D., presided at the afternoon meeting, and the principal address was made by the Rev. Lawrence J. Ware, Field Secretary of the Department of Religious Education of the Province of Washington.

Supper was served in St. James' cafeteria, and the evening session was presided over by Bishop Rhinelander. The principal speaker was the Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, President of the Department of Religious Education of the Province of Washington, whose subject was "The Vital Importance of Religious Education." The Rev. Frank Goostray spoke of "The Value of Pageantry in Church School Work." A feature of the institute was the presentation of diplomas for teachers' training to twenty-two who had completed the course.

It was announced that the annual Sunday school Lenten offering of 1922 should be $55,000.

A number of churches and charitable institutions benefit by the will of Thomas H. Gesner, which was probated October 24.

St. James' Church, Sixty-ninth Street and Woodland Avenue, Philadelphia, will receive a bequest of $1,000 and an additional $500 for a memorial window. Among other bequests are: Home for the Aged under the care of the Little Sisters of the Poor and the Episcopal Hospital.

The Washington Synod.

The General Committee on Arrangements, with Mr. Henry B. Thompson as chairman, is rapidly perfecting its plans for the coming meeting of the Synod, November 15, 16 and 17, in Wilmington, Del.

On Monday night Bishop and Mrs. Cook, assisted by the Church Club of Delaware, will give a reception for the delegates and visitors at Bishopstead.

Trinity Church and Parish House will be the headquarters of the Synod, and St. Andrew's Church headquarters for the women's organizations.

The opening service will be held Tuesday, November 15, at Trinity Church, with celebration of the Holy Communion, by the President of the Synod, Bishop Brown, of Virginia, and sermon by the Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, D. D.

Mass meetings in the interest of Missions, Religious Education and Social Service will be held each night, when addresses will be made by the following well-known speakers: On Missions, the Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., and the Rev. S. Harrington Littell, of Hankow; on Religious Education, the Rev. William E. Gardner, D. D., the Rev. Gardiner L. Tucker, and the Rev. John Suter, Jr.; on Social Service, Deaconess Maria P. Williams, the Rev. Robert P. Kreitler and the Rev. C. G. Twombley.

Bishop Knight's Home Burned.

The residence of the Rt. Rev. A. W. Knight, D. D., vice-chancellor of the University of the South, Sewanee, was completely destroyed by fire Wednesday morning, the contents being saved by quick work of the entire student body. Bishop Knight and his wife were at Savannah, Ga., attending the Synod of the Province of Sewanee, and the loss could not be ascertained.

EAST CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

A Confirmation Service of Unusual Interest.

A striking feature of a recent confirmation service held by Bishop Darst in St. Mary's Church, Kinston, was the presence at the service of the whole of the City Council. The Mayor of the city was in the confirmation class, and the Council attended in a body as a mark of respect.

That St. Mary's has made a growth of from thirty to forty per cent. in the past two years was disclosed at a dinner given to the men of that church at the Kinoca Club, Kinston, on October 24. T. W. Mewborn, prominent business man of that city, was toastmaster. The principal speakers at the dinner were the Rev. F. J. H. Coffin, rector, and State Senator G. V. Cowper. The women of the Church Service League served the dinner. St. Mary's Church has made great strides in all departments of the Church's work during the past few years.

Sectional Conferences Well Attended.

The Diocese of East Carolina has just completed the holding of seven sectional conferences for the study of the 1921 program of the Church. These conferences, held in different parts of the Diocese, were well attended and much interest was manifested. The presence of two of East Carolina's missionaries was a feature of these conferences. Archdeacon Frederick B. Drane, of Alaska, and Miss Venitia Cox, of China, both of whom are on leave of absence, made addresses at the conferences. Their presence was of particular interest, now that the missionary work of the Church is to the fore. These sectional conferences are to be followed by parochial conferences.

Woman's Work in the Diocese.

Because of the great emphasis which it puts upon the work of the women in the Church, the Diocese of East Carolina now has two paid, full-time secretaries for women's work. Mrs. A. M. Waddell has for some time been acting in the capacity of field secretary. Miss Rena Harding is now devoting all of her time to the development of the Church School Service League in the Diocese. The financial responsibility for the work of these two women is shared by the women's organizations.

"Pay-Up" Week for N.-W. C.

The week of October 23 was designated as "Pay-Up" Week in the Diocese of Eastern Carolina, special effort being made to collect the unpaid Nation-Wide Campaign pledges of the current year. The Rev. W. R. Noe, Executive Secretary of the Bishop and Executive Council, led in this campaign. The returns are not in as yet, but it is believed that when the Executive Council of the Diocese meets in Wilmington on November 3 it will have encouraging news. The business depression of the past year has greatly affected the payment of the pledges, but the treasurers report more optimism, now that the fall crops are being harvested and the prices have improved.

Two churches in the Diocese have paid their 1921 Nation-Wide Campaign pledges in full, Grace Church, Woodville, and St. Paul's, Edenton. Both churches pledged more than their quota.

A number of parochial missions have been held in the Diocese during the fall. The Rev. W. R. Noe, Executive Secretary, has held three missions in various parts of the Diocese. Three missions have been held in the field served by the Rev. Theodore Patrick, Jr., of Plymouth; one by the Rev. A. R. Parshley, at Christ Church, Creswell; a second by the Rev. L. N. Taylor, at Grace Church, Plymouth, and the third by the Rev. C. A. Ashby, at St. Andrew's Church, Columbia. There were four daily services at these missions; communion at 7:30, noon-day service for men, prayer service for women in the afternoon, and the preaching service in the evening.

Sudden Death of the Rev. Thomas Howell.

A pall of greatest distress is cast over the Diocese by news of the tragic death at Basic on Friday, October 28, of the Rev. Thomas Howell, of New Glasgow. Details are lacking at this time, but it appears that Mr. Howell had just left the train when he was struck by an automobile.

By his death the Church in this Diocese loses one of its most faithful ministers, a man of untiring energy, unbounded zeal, always attentive to the duties that lay before him, and efficient in their performance.

At the same time impressive and charming in the simplicity of his life and character, his gentleness of mind and heart, his kind courtesy and thoughtfulness, Mr. Howell had endeared himself to all who had the privilege of knowing him.

He was ordained deacon in 1910 and priest in 1912. For several years he has been rector of Emmanuel Church, Madison Heights, and in charge of Trinity Church, Boonsboro, and St. John's, Waynesboro, in addition to which he has held many services at Ivy Chapel at Coffee, in Bedford County.

New River Convocation.

The fall meeting of the New River Convocation was held in Christ Church, Blacksburg, October 18 to 20, with a full attendance of clergy, and several laymen also present.

The Rev. William J. Alfriend preached on Tuesday evening, and the Convocation sermon was preached by the Rev. W. E. Roach on Wednesday morning. The addresses at the evening services on Wednesday were made by the Rev. Claudius F. Smith, on Missions; Mr. Dabney S. Lancaster, on Religious Education, and the Rev. Edward W. Hughes, on Social Service.

The Quiet Hour was conducted by the Rev. William Byrd Lee, Sr., on Thursday morning. This was of great spiritual uplift to all present. Following Mr. Lee's devotions the Bishop held a conference with the Convocation speakers upon vital and practical subjects.

The Rev. Devall L. Gwathmey read an essay on how to work the Nation-Wide Campaign this fall, and the theoretic essay was read by Rev. Thomas G. Faulkner, on "The Kingdom of God." Both of these essays brought forth enthusiastic and helpful discussion.

The dean led the conference on the Nation-Wide Campaign work, and all of the clergy present took part, and reported encouraging progress in the various parishes.

The officers elected for the coming year were: The Rev. G. Otis Mead, Dean; the Rev. M. Paul S. Huntington, Secretary; the Rev. Duval L. Gwathmey, Treasurer.

The next meeting is to be held in April at St. Peter's, Rocky Mount, Va., the Rev. W. T. Roberts, rector.

Preaching Mission.

The Rev. E. C. Seaman, of Gadsden, Ala., conducted a preaching mission last month in Grace Church, Woodlawn, Birmingham, the Rev. Carl Henckell, rector. The special intention throughout was to stimulate interest in the building program of the parish and in the Nation-Wide Campaign for the Church's mission. There was an early administration of Holy Communion for business people and a later one for housekeepers. The question box and intercessory prayers added a personal touch. ubsequently an every-member dollar offering for the building fund was inaugurated with a view to binding all the members together in the greater Grace Church program.

The dean of the Convocation, Dr. Edmonds Bennett, was present part of the time.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd. D. D., Suffragan.
Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan-Elect.

Anniversaries of Two Historic Institutions Observed.

Historic St. Paul's Chapel celebrated on the last Sunday in October the one hundred and fifty-fifth anniversary of the consecration of the edifice. The chapel is the oldest public building in Greater New York. Several Trinity vestry attended, as did many representatives of old Trinity families. The Rev. Dr. Greer, vicar-emeritus, was present and took part. The Rev. Dr. McComas preached and recalled the idealism for which the Church stands, for which St. Paul's Chapel has always stood.

Among many other good works of Trinity Parish long years ago was the New York Hospital and assistance in its founding in 1771. The one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of it was celebrated in Trinity Church on October 26, many well-known persons attending. It was in this hospital that was given the first care for mental diseases in the State, where vaccination for smallpox was first used in America, and where many brilliant operations were first performed. Bishop Manning was the speaker, and so was Governor Miller. The president, Edward W. Sheldon, presided. The address of most marked distinction was that of Mr. Elihu Root, one of the American delegates to the Disarmament Conference.

Institution of the Rev. Dr. Van de Water.

On the last Sunday in October Bishop Manning instituted the Rev. Dr. George R. Van de Water as rector of the Church of the Beloved Disciple. The institution had been delayed owing to the death of Bishop Burch. The new Beloved Disciple rector was for many years rector of St. Andrew's, Harlem, and at one time missioner of the old Parochial Mission Society. The Bishop preached, and greeted a large congregation.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Preparing for the Great Conference.

Sermons and services everywhere in the Diocese remind one of the great conference so soon to take place in Washington, and as representatives of the nations arrive and are seen here and there in the nation's capital, Church people everywhere must realize more keenly than ever before the great responsibility upon them for the successful outcome of any undertaking here for peace. Special prayers and sermons will be heard for the conference probably all through the time of its meeting. Washington represents the nation politically. Why should not she take the lead in a great move for more spirituality and the only way toward the solution of the peace problem?

A Russian service was held recently at St. John's Church on Sunday afternoon, by the Rev. C. V. Seletzky, of the Russian Greek Catholic Church, Baltimore. It was attended by the Russian colony of Washington and a number of Americans, one of them being Rear Admiral McCully, U. S. N., who was accompanied by his seven adopted Russian orphans. The children took the leading part in the choir, and the singing was hearty and inspirational. The Russians were glad to hear a service in their own tongue, and will have this opportunity every Sunday afternoon, when such a service will be held in the parish hall of St. John's Church.

At the Christian Healing services at St. Stephen's Church, on Tuesday, November 1, Miss Mattie Perry, of the Gospel Mission, made the address. Miss Perry has done splendid and unusual work along this line, and brought to this service great spiritual help for all who were present. She is from Columbia, S. C., and was herself cured from a serious illness by Christian healing.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

The Archdeaconry of Williamsport met in St. Paul's Church, Bloomsburg, on Monday evening, October 24, and continued over the following day. The preacher on Monday evening was the Rev. George R. Van De Water, D. D., of New York.

At the business meeting on Tuesday the Rev. Robert R. Morgan was elected Archdeacon in place of the Rev. George T. Lascelle, resigned. Mr. Lascelle has accepted a call to the Diocese of Western New York, effective November 15.

Burglars entered St. Matthew's Church, Sunbury, recently and carried off nine pieces of silver belonging to the communion service. No traces of the thieves have been found.

The Path of Life.

Ethel Nelson.

I stood before the paths of life,
And one was made for me;
I was afraid to venture down
A way I could not see.
I ask no help, nor did I see
(For pride had shamed my fears),
The Hand outstretched to help me o'er;
But stumbled on for years.

I wandered on through dreary wastes,
No nearer to the goal.
I felt that I alone could be
The master of my soul.
The places bright, but dimmed my sight,
The dark ones stayed my pace,
Till tired, weary and forlorn
I reached my starting place.

My head I bowed in humbleness;
Too small and weak I felt
To battle with the mysteries
Of life which God had dealt.
My bravery naught but foolish pride
I cast aside, and there
I called to God to lead me safe
Up to His kingdom fair.

I was again before the paths,
And lo! the way was cleared.
"Come, follow me," a sweet voice said,
"I've trod this path for years."
I clasped the Hand, nor did I care
That all the world might see;
I was a child to Him Who gave
His life for such as me.

The Girl That Changed Her Mind.

Elizabeth Townsend, "the newest teacher," so called by the girls at Miss Wilson's, because it was her first year at the school, closed her reference with a half sigh, patted her wavy dark hair, looked at her watch and then began in methodical fashion to put her room in order before going to bed, smiling as she did so, remembering her childhood training. It was early November, a blustering wind was shaking her window, as if trying to force its way into the warm, softly lighted interior. The corridor was quiet, the retiring bell having rung twenty minutes before, and all the fifteen girls in her charge, she hoped, had settled down for the night. "The newest teacher" had been only a year out of college, this work was new to her, and she found it hard to become accustomed to the little rushing world of a New York boarding school and her new responsibilities. She started, as a light knock sounded once, and then again, at the door. One of the teachers, probably, coming in for a late conference, or a talk over some difficult girl. Then she hurried to open to her caller, secretly hoping whoever it was, she wouldn't stay too long.

In the dim light of the hall she saw one of her corridor girls, Ruth Drake, a slim figure clad in a blue kimono, her long fair hair falling in a cloud around her shoulders, and as the girl came into the room the light shining on her face showed it to be tear-stained, her eyes were brimmed with tears, and she looked indeed a weeping Niobe.

"Oh, Miss Townsend," the voice of the caller was broken with sobs, "will you help me, will you?" and a hot hand clutched the teacher's firm, cool one.

"I want to go away tonight. I must go tonight. You see, I've been fighting home-sickness until I'm almost wild. I can't think of much except my people and the home and town I just love. Oh, however could I have left it! But I've stood it all just as long as I can, and now I've decided," with a quick catch of breath. "I have money enough to carry me to Denver, I'm sure. I can't just remember what the ticket is, of course. Father bought mine coming up. I've packed my suitcase, and my trunks can come after me. Lots of girls travel alone. I'm not afraid. This house is closed for the night. The watchman is in the front hall the early part of the night, one of the waitresses told me. If you only will go with me to the station. I always get mixed up there; you can help me right through. Just start me off, and that's all I need. You see," her voice rising in her excitement, "we can easily get out the rear entrance and find a taxi at the corner. Will you; will you go with me? I'll be thankful to you all my life if you will."

The trembling hands were outstretched pleadingly, and for a moment there was utter silence in the little room. Then "the newest teacher" spoke, and her face was very grave. "My dear girl, can't you see it's quite impossible for me to help you in this way! I am a teacher here, responsible to the principal for what I do, pledged to support the honor of the school, and what would any one say or think if I helped a pupil to run away under cover of the night, because she was home-sick!" Then, at sight of the tragic young face watching hers, she put a protecting arm around the pitiful shaking figure, and drew her down on the bed beside her.

"Listen, Ruth," she began, her own voice trembling with sympathy, "I'm just as sorry for you as I can be. Home-sickness is a sickness, very real while it lasts, suffering which is hard to bear, and most people have had a touch of it at one time or another, but believe me, it can be overcome. Let's talk over this trouble of yours quietly and sanely," unheeding the choked sobs. "Your people have paid half of your tuition I know, for that is Miss Wilson's rule. You're taking very expensive vocal lessons with a well-known teacher who is paid in advance, your music has been bought, school books, too; your railroad fare alone was a good deal, from Denver to New York; your school wardrobe pretty and appropriate and most complete—I've noticed your sweet gowns and all, and now you propose to throw all those things over and go home. I know a quitter has a harsh sound, but that is just what you would be, Ruth, a quitter, and there's more to it than all this, for oh, my dear, if you give up and go back to your home town, after a hardly begun term, your record, instead of the interesting year at a well-known New York school, will be simply summed up as a failure, and that written in large letters. Believe me, child, this failure would follow you all through your life. You would be spoken of as the girl who hadn't backbone or courage to live up to what she attempted to do."

"My family will understand," a quick sob followed the half-whispered words.

"Perhaps"—and the young teacher's face was pale as she continued, "perhaps. The right sort of families have a way of understanding each other, I'm glad to say; but won't all of your relatives be bitterly disappointed in you?" There was utter silence. "They'd forgive me." Ruth's voice was a trifle more steady, and noting this, Miss Townsend was encouraged to fire her last shot.

"I ask you this, Ruth; I want you to promise that you'll make a big effort and stay on until Christmas. I'll help you in every way I can; this shall be just between ourselves; I will speak of it to no one, but I don't want one of my corridor girls to give up, slump. It isn't long before the holidays, less than two months—you are going home for vacation anyway. So see if you can't stick it out till Christmas. Will you, Ruth?"

Somewhere far off in the great quiet building a clock struck eleven leisurely strokes, and from the tower of a distant church a clock chimed faintly like a silver eho. The girl rose to her feet, looked about uncertainly, wiped her eyes, then announced briefly, "I'll try, Miss Townsend," but, as a quick afterthought, "I don't think I can go through with it. Thank you heaps for being so good to me; I just had to find you. We girls always feel you aren't very much older than we, so it was easier to talk to you tonight."

"I'm so glad of that"—the teacher's sensitive face flushed warmly—"I want to keep in touch with you all. Now, good night, and try to sleep," and she watched the blue-clad figure disappear into her own room. Long after her youthful caller had crept into bed, and in real girlish fashion, trouble forgotten, had gone to sleep, Miss Townsend stood at the window looking out into the night. Across the broad river the friendly lights of little towns twinkled like fireflies in the June garden at home, and as she turned away she pauseed in front of a framed photograph of an elderly scholarly looking man, which stood on her table. "I wish," she said, her eyes meeting the pictured eyes—steady, tranquil ones, "I wish, father, you could advise us both, just now, but you are a bit far off." Her brows were still drawn together and her lips were tightly closed twenty minutes later, but at last she smiled in satisfied fashion, murmuring as she turned out her light:

"I'm glad I thought of her, small forlorn Betty may help out home-sick Ruth."

It was not till after lunch next day that Miss Townsend had an opportunity to speak to Ruth, and she felt a quick thrill of sympathy as she noted her pale cheeks and heavy eyes, as she crossed the hall to meet her late caller. "Let's walk up and down for a few moments," she began cheerfully, linking her arm in that of the girl's; "I want you to help me out this time, will you, dear?"

"If I can." The tone was not encouraging, but undaunted Miss Townsend continued: "You know I am in charge of the four younger girls a part of each day! They are practically little girls, for not one of them is older than eleven, and Betty, the school baby, as we speak of her, is only seven. Betty is a pitiful little mite, small for her age, and those big brown eyes of hers always seem to me particularly wistful. You know, or perhaps you don't know, that her father is a navy man, a captain on one of our warships, and her mother, a delicate little woman, is usually traveling to meet him at some far off port or other, and so this little one hasn't had much home life. She always reminds me of that quotation from Mrs. Browning about the child Aurora Leigh, who felt a mother want about the world, like a bleating lamb left out at night in shutting up the fold. Won't you, Ruth dear, sort of do the big sister act? It would be real charity, and perhaps you will even find pleasure in doing it."

"I might." In spite of herself, Ruth's voice was interested. "Poor little kid, I should think a great busy school like this would be a lonely place for a seven-year-old. There she is now," and Ruth's eyes studied the little dark-eyed girl who was standing alone watching the older pupils visiting together, and a moment later Miss Townsend passing by, smiled well content to hear the child laugh delightedly in answer to a kindly query from her new friend, and her reply, "Oh yes, Patty and I would love to come to see you this afternoon; I—I like picture puzzles—" and then the newest teacher was out of sight.

As the days passed in her swift routine Miss Townsend noticed the change in her home-sick pupil. Her cheeks had gained new color, her eyes were bright, and from time to time she could be seen visiting with the other girls in normal fashion, and sometimes as the newest teacher passed Ruth's room she heard the murmur of happy voices, a child's light laughter, and decided that all was going as she had hoped. As for small Betty, she blossomed like a veritable rose under the new conditions. Her hair shone as if from much brushing, the big ribbon bows that perched like gay butterflies on the very top of the dark little head were always smartly tied. Sometimes the school baby might be seen curled up by Ruth in some retired window seat, listening blissfully to a story the older girl was reading, or doing her funny little Christmas fancy work close to her new friend in the long living room. "Ruth's Shadow" was the nickname now, and to the great amusement of the girls of her own age, Ruth so loyally championed Betty, that it would have been indeed a brave one who presumed to criticize the child in her presence.

It was after a talk with the principal one afternoon early in December that that dignified personage remarked, patting the round wrist near her own, "Well, my dear Miss Townsend, besides saving a pupil for us, I think you are bringing out the womanly gentle qualities in Ruth Drake by asking her assistance with this school baby of ours. It was a clever move, and a very kind thought as well; you deserve all our thanks. You aren't so far away from Little Girl Land yourself, but that you are pretty closely in touch with youth, and a school has need of such as you."

As the half confused but happy "newest teacher" went to her own room, she smiled as she mused to herself over the fact that both teachers and pupils would have been surprised if they had known that in helping Ruth and Betty she had also helped herself, vaguely home-sick as she often was for her own distant home, and the college that drew dearer as the time passed.

A cheerful, hopeful Ruth went back to Denver for the holidays, and a just as cheerful Ruth returned to school after the recess was over, entering into all the school affairs with renewed zeal that both surprised and delighted the teachers and her fellow-pupils. It was in Miss Townsend's room one evening that Ruth, who had "come to 'fess," as she expressed it, curled up in a big wicker chair by the desk, owned honestly to the change in herself:

"Of course you know I'm all over my home-sickness, and oh, how could it have happened! Nothing could keep me from coming back to this dear old school. Why, I was talking about it all the time to the family and girls I knew best at home. Guess I'm a good little booster, for at least three of my best friends think they can persuade their parents to let them come to such a wonderful place next year. I did not add that I had almost died of home-sickness at first." She smiled, half teased at the recollection. "But if nothing had brought me back, little Bettykins would, for somehow I like to think she needs me; and do you know, her mother wrote me the dearest letter thanking me for all my goodness to her little daughter! Goodness! why, it's only a pleasure, and you should have seen how glad the dear mite was to get me back! You know she spent the vacation here, and it was pretty quiet and lonely for such a child. And oh, you dear, dear Miss Townsend"—throwing her arms around the surprised young teacher, "I have you to thank for it all! First, for making me brace up and not be a baby, and then for suggesting that I look out for Betty, and"—looking mischievously up into Elizabeth Townsend's honest gray eyes—"and oh, wasn't it really a deep scheme of yours to take my mind off myself, but a truly lovely one—now wasn't it?

"Perhaps," the young teacher's face glowed, then softened into seriousness, "but I'm not sorry that I suggested it."

"Sorry! I'll thank you all my life." The girl's lips trembled and she looked out of the window at the wintry sky. Then a high little voice outside the door called, "Where's my Ruth! I want to show her something lovely!" and Miss Townsend's caller made swift answer: "Coming, Bettykins. Good-bye, Miss Townsend!" and the newest teacher was left alone.—Alix Thorn, in Presbyterian Banner.

The Great Eangelist Wins an Italian Poet.

What a wonderful place the Bible has in evangelism. Throughout the length and breadth of America there are enthusiasts for the work of the American Bible Society because they believe, with it, that the Scriptures themselves form the most effective missionary ever known. The vitality of this belief is constantly strengthened by such testimonies as the following, related at the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, by a pioneer missionary and translator of the New Testament, who says:

"Let me tell you of Giovanni Papini, a poet, philosopher, the most brilliant writer of Italian that is living today. His story is very significant; you have this most brilliant of living Italian writers confessing to the world that he has found Jesus Christ, and found Him through reading the pages of the New Testament. He tells us that from his earliest youth he had a feeling of repulsion from all religion, from all churches. He grew up absolutely devoid of faith. Then came the war, and for Papini, as for thousands of others, it meant a spiritual crisis. What was the meaning of it all? He was dismayed by the horrible tragedy. He ceased to write, and plunged into a re-examination of the histories and philosophies, the wars and migrations of peoples, the rise and fall of civilizations, the laws and customs and religions of mankind. He studied them all to find a clue to the meaning of things. He found that all the endeavorers made by men to install an ephemeral happiness on earth had resulted only in deluging the earth with blood and tears. Then it occurred to him that perhaps after all there might be something that would throw light upon his problem in the neglected New Testament, and he came to the New Testament with a heart full of desire, full of hope, and he tells us that he has found there certainty and peace. With all the fervor of an apostle, Giovanni Papini today is preaching, through his pen, the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ."—Selected.

Hymn For

The Daughters of the King.

Rev. C. F. Hinton.

O King of Kings, most Glorious! Thy Daughters, pledged, are we;
And on our Flag, inscribed in Gold, is "Service—Loyalty":
Before Thy Triune Majesty we humbly bow and pray
For Grace to keep us faithful still, however hard the way.

And Thou, O Blessed Jesus Christ, our Brother and our God!
Whose Precious Blood, in service dread, was poured on Calv'ry's sod;
Grant us to feel Thy Presence sweet beside us as we work,
That, doing all for Thy dear Sake, we may no duty shirk.

And if our path of service, too, shall mean the Dolorous Way,
That we, on our small Calvaries, the Price of Love shall pay;
Lord, keep us faithful to the end, that, suffering with Thee,
We still may serve the King of Kings, and His true Daughters be.

Fill us, O Loving Father, with bright Visions of that Day
When all the earth shall hail Thee Lord, and live beneath Thy sway;
When sin no more shall boast its power; when self shall lose its throne;
When men, as brothers, side by side, Thy Fatherhood shall own;

When we, like Miriam shall sing; like Deborah rejoice;
Like ancient Israel's Daughters for joy lift up our voice
To greet the Hosts of Victory returning from the Strife
Led by the Captain Glorious, Thy Son the Prince of Life.

Lord, fill us with the Vision bright, that we may clearly see
That all our simple, daily tasks live in that Victory;
That, though at times they seem so dull, and commonplace, and small,
They are, in truth, the Jeweled Stones which build New Zion's Wall.

For the Young Folks

Keep On Rowing.

"Pray to God, but keep on rowing!"
So the ancient proverb ran,
Murmured, 'mid the fierce winds blowing,
By the toil-worn fisherman.

"Pray to God!" Without His sharing
Work were useless, day by day;
Burdens hardly worth the bearing,
Hope but quicksand, to betray.

"Keep on rowing!" He will guide us
O'er the billows topped with foam;
And our boat, whate'er betide us,
Soon shall bear us safely home.
—W. B. Allen, in Lutheran.

Some Interesting Place Names.

Probably in no other country have the names of places been derived from so many peoples and tongues as in the United States. New York and Pennsylvania abound with names of Dutch origin; in New England, Virginia, and, in fact, all along the Eastern coast, the towns of England and the people famous in English history are immortalized; the trail of the early French explorers may be traced today by means of the musical names of cities and towns which they settled and rivers and mountains which they discovered; the Spanish padres and cavaleros have left their indelible records in the West, particularly the Southwest; and everywhere, from North to South, from East to West, are names taken from the language of the North American Indian.

Yonkers, N. Y., was named after a manor-house built by the Dutch, the word meaning "young lord," and first applied in this country to Adrien Van der Douck, a patentee. Another interesting Dutch name is Schuylkill, which means "hidden stream," and was so called by the Dutch because the first explorers passed that river's mouth without seeing it.

In connection with the purely English names, it is interesting to note some of the Charlestons and Charlestowns and their derivations. Charleston, S. C., was originally called Charles Town in honor of Charles II of England; and Charlestown, part of the city of Boston, Mass., was named in honor of Charles I of England; Charlestown, N. H., was named for Sir Charles Knowles, a British admiral, and Charlestown, W. Va., was named for the brother of George Washington, Charles Washington, who owned the land upon which the town was built.

Lac qui Parle (a county, lake and river in Minnesota) is a French name, meaning the "Lake that Talks," or "Speaking Lake." La Crosse (the city in Wisconsin) was named by the French after a ball game which the Indians used to play there. Terre Haute, Ind., means "high land," and was so called by the French because it is built upon a bank sixty feet above the river.

The Spanish and Indian words for water, agua and minni, respectively, are used in connection with various prefixes and suffixes to form many interesting names. Of the Spanish ones. Agua Caliente, meaning "hot water"; Agua Dulce, "sweet water," and Agua Fria, "cold water," are good examples. Agua Caliente is the name of villages in Arizona and California, near which are warm springs; Agua Dulce is the name of a creek in Texas; and Agua Fria that of a valley in Arizona and of a peak and village in New Mexico.

The beautiful Indian names Minnesota, "much water," or "cloudy water," and Minnehaha, "laughing water," are familiar to most of us. Minneapolis, "water city," is not a pure Indian name, being formed of the Indian minni and the Greek word for city, polis.

Los Gatos, Cal., means in Spanish "The Cats," and was doubtless applied to the city because of the presence of wildcats in the vicinity. Los Angeles, Cal., means in Spanish "The Angels," and so is "the city of the angels."

Niagara is an Indian word meaning "across the neck or strait," or "at the neck."

How did your home town get its name?—Pauline Barr, in St. Nicholas.

Pussy-Gray's Journey.

A. L. Reese.

Pussy-Gray and his brother, Malty, lived on a country place, about eight miles from a big city. They were very happy cats for a long time, playing together, racing over the grass, and having a good time all day long.

But a time came when Kathleen and Bob, to whom the cats belonged, were very much distressed to see them fight and quarrel. One day they had a terrible fight, and Pussy-Gray chased Malty through the house, into the parlor, and straight through a pane of glass in a window, which came down to the floor!

As they would not live together without fighting, the father of the family said he would try to find another home for Pussy-Gray. Kathleen and Bob were very sorry to give him up, but agreed it was best to separate these pussy brothers who would not agree.

So one morning father put him in a covered basket and took him to the city on the train. Now, please remember, he was in a covered basket, so he could not see where he was going The man to whom Pussy-Gray was given kept him shut up all that day, and at night took him to his new home.

One morning, about a week afterwards, while the children's mother was dressing, she heard a cat mewing. She looked out of the window, and there on the porch roof was poor old Pussy-Gray, very thin and forlorn-looking, begging to be let in! He had come all the way from the big city, eight miles away, had climbed up the honey-suckle vine at the corner of the porch, and gone to the window where he had been let in so many times before. He was never sent away any more, but lived in his old home till he died. This is a true story.

The Duty That Is Nearest.

"Do the duty which lies nearest thee which thou knowest to be a duty. Thy second duty will already have become clearer." So wrote Thomas Carlyle to those who were perplexed about what they ought to do.

His advice is fundamental and the very heart of wisdom. It is also a key to unlock doors of uncertainty in every direction. Young men often never discover what their life work is to be until they begin at humble tasks near at hand. One of the most successful business men began work at a dollar and a quarter a day as a common laborer, after having graduated from a technical school. He found himself and his career while at this work.

The shortest way to the peace of God and to spiritual power is often by self-forgetful service in the name of God, with insignificant work near at hand. The work may seem to have no relation to the soul's larger interests, and none whatever to the tasks of a lifetime; and yet in the doing of it with faith and love the disciple finds himself in the presence of God, walking on his life's great highway.

"Do the duty which lies nearest thee." Do it with a loving heart. Do it in confidence that God will assign the highest and most useful tasks that are possible to those whom He can trust.—Western Christian Advocate.

Little Brown Bushy-Tail.

Little brown Bushy-Tail lived up a tree,
And mossy and snug was his nest;
Acorns and beechnuts in plenty had he,
And he scarcely knew which he liked best.

He was cheery of temper, and agile of limb,
And his own little will was his law;
For what was the world and its worries to him,
When he held a plump nut in his claw.

As he cracked it he twinkled his knowing black eyes,
The kernel picked out by and by;
Then he ate it, and looked uncommonly wise,
Said, "Folk may be worse off than I."

"For I'm sure I'm content with my portion in life,
And of nuts I've a plentiful store;
With my little brown babies, and little brown wife,
What on earth could a squirrel want more?"

He had lots of near neighbors as merry as he,
They were cheery and playful each one;
Don't they show us that happy 'tis easy to be
If good humor we give with our fun?

Content with the blessings our Father may give,
How happy would all of us be;
If we tried with our friends and our neighbors to live
As the brown squirrels did in the tree!

A Pleasant Surprise.

All forenoon Nellie had been helping and watching papa put away apples and potatoes in pits for the winter, because you see it was Saturday and she was not in school.

"I wish," said papa, "that we had some winesaps to put away. Seems we haven't any good apples for eating raw this year, but then, I'm thankful for what we've got anyway."

Now when papa said that, Nellie smiled to herself because she knew a secret that papa didn't know; nor mamma, nor Brother Duncan—nor anybody else. Nellie found her secret when she was playing one September day out in the new orchard. The new orchard was away—way out from the house, and there were young trees there nearly old enough to be having apples on them. Nellie saw a pretty big tree she thought she would like to climb, so she got into it, and what do you think—way up in the top of the tree, all on one little branch, were some simply splendid nice red winesaps, and nobody else knew a thing about them, for you couldn't hardly see them until you got up into the tree. Nellie could hardly wait until papa got through with her helping him, she was so eager to run out and pick those apples. So when he was all through, away she skipped to the little winesap tree.

She picked the apples very carefully and didn't let any of them fall to the ground, because you know that would bruise them and they would not keep so well. There were just fourteen apples ;that would be three for mamma and three for papa and three for Duncan and three for grandma and two for Nellie.

"I am going to put them in a pit," thought Nellie, "and not tell anybody about them."

Then she ran off and got the hoe and spade for her digging. Now a short distance from the winesap tree there was a row of cherry trees; and there were a lot of young cherry trees sprouting up around them. Nellie thought this would be a good place to hide her apples. There was a little open space among some tall young saplings where Nellie used to come to read in the summer time. The ground was nice and soft there and not a bit hard to dig. So she leveled off a little space and then laid dry leaves and clean grass on it; then she piled the apples on that in a nice little heap. How pretty and red they looked! Then she put nice, clean, dry grass all over them, and covered that with dirt. Then she dug a little trench around her apple pit, and that was to drain the water off, and it had to be deeper than where the apples were because if water came in on the apples from the winter rains or snows it might make them spoil. So when Nellie had her apples all covered up nicely so the frost couldn't get at them, she took her spade and hoe and ran back to the house again; and she didn't tell anybody for ever and ever so long—clear past Thanksgiving and Christmas and New Years.

Then there were some warm days in February when the frost all thawed out of the ground, and Nellie ran out to her apple pit and opened it and there were her apples as fine as you please—she could hardly keep from eating one, they looked so good.

So she cleaned them off and brought them into the house and hid them up in her room, and after supper, when they were all sitting around the fire, mamma said:

"I do wish we had some good eating apples this year."

Then Nellie slipped up to her room and brought the apples down into the hall.

"You must all shut your eyes and hold your hands out," she said, "for I've got a surprise to put in your hands."

So they all did as she said, and Nellie felt, oh, so happy to think she had those apples to give to mamma and the rest just when they wanted them so badly.—Presbyterian Banner.

Rt. Rev. G. H. Kinsolving, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Quin, D. D., Coadjutor.

St. Paul's Church, Waco.

There has been a great deal done recently toward the fulfilling of the advanced program in St. Paul's Church, the Rev. W. P. Witsell, rector.

The rector and his family have moved into a commodious and beautiful new rectory in one of the most desirable sections of the city. The old rectory will be used in connection with the parish house, as a center of Young People's activities and for other general church purposes.

Bishop Quin visited the parish on October 14 to administer confirmation for the fourth time since April 1, the total number confirmed in that time being seventy-six.

On October 6 the Church Service League of the parish held its quarterly meeting and made the feature of the meeting the celebration of the tenth anniversary of the rectorship of the present incumbent. A paper setting forth the remarkable progress of the parish during these ten years was read by Miss Minnie Taylor. Each organization in the parish has a definite program for the year, and it is believed that St. Paul's is entering upon the finest year of its existence. The work at St. Paul's House Settlement, in the Mill District, is progressing very nicely under the leadership of Mrs. M. H. Wolford, and consists of kindergarten, Day Nursery, Mothers' Club, girls' sewing classes, boys' clubs, Sunday school, recreational activities, including a free picture show each week.

One young man of the parish, Mr. Lyle S. Barnett, has been accepted as a postulant, and is now at Sewanee in course of preparation.

Week-day religious instruction for high school boys and girls has started with a very competent teacher, Miss Annie Hill and a good attendance

WYOMING

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop.

Death of the Rev. Morten Joslin.

At midnight on Wednesday, October 5, the Rev. Morten Joslin, rector of the Church of the Holy Communion, Rock Springs, died after an illness of but a week.

Mr. Joslin was born in England in 1869. In his early manhood he became a minister of the Presbyterian Church, but returned to his native Church a few years ago. He was ordained deacon in 1917 and advanced to the priesthood in June, 1918, by the Bishop of Wyoming. He served as vicar of St. James' Church, Kemmerer, for a few months and acted as locum tenens at St. Matthew's Cathedral, Laramie, during the absence of Dean Thornberry in war service. Mr. Joslin was then called to the Church of the Holy Communion, Rock Springs, of which he was rector for a little over two years.

Mr. Joslin was a man of great nobility of character, earnestness of purpose, and efficiency of service. He was beloved by all with whom he came in contact, by reason of the great strength and sweetness of his nature. His death, at the very prime of life, is a heavy loss to the Missionary District of Wyoming. At the time of his death he was the efficient editor of the Wyoming Churchman. He was also a delegate to the Provincial Synod of the Sixth Province at Davenport, in 1920.

Funeral services were held in his parish church in Rock Springs on Sunday afternoon, October 9, conducted by Bishop Thomas, the Rev. M. B. Nash, the Rev. R. E. Abraham, and Archdeacon Dray, who spoke feelingly of the life and service of Mr. Joslin. The body was taken to Laramie, where services were held at the Cathedral and at the cemetery on Monday. Dean Thornberry took the services at the Cathedral, and Dean Nash and Archdeacon Dray read the service at the grave, Bishop Thomas taking the committal.

The entire Rock Springs choir accompanied the remains to Laramie from Rock Springs, and sang at the Cathedral and at the grave, as a labor of love and a tribute to their beloved rector.

Archdeacon Dray is acting as locum tenens at the Church of the Holy Communion, Rock Springs, until the vestry elect a successor to the late rector. The Archdeacon is also editing the Wyoming Churchman temporarily, until permanent arrangements are made.

Bishop Thomas Organizes Unique League.

Bishop Thomas, impressed with the moral needs of the present day, recently organized in Cheyenne a body of representative citizens for the purpose of improving the morals and manners of our youth. The Bishop is the president of this organization, and committees on recreation, the movies and Bible study in the schools are working out their respective problems. The personnel of this league is interesting, and consists of the following: The Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, the general superintendent, the superintendent of the Wyoming division, and the master mechanic of the Union Pacific Railroad, the general representative and the Commissioner of Labor, the heads of the Y. W. C. A. and the Salvation Army, representatives of the press, of education, of the bench, the bar, and Terrell-Hubard: MISS POCAHONTAS BOLLING HUBARD, youngest child of the late Mr. and Mrs. Robert Thruston Hubard, was married at her home, Chellowe, in Buckingham County, on October 5, to MR. ALBERT JOHNSTON TERRELL, of Bear Garden, in the same county. The Rev. Lyttleton E. Hubard, of Elizabeth, N. J., assisted by the Rev. Plummer F. Jones, performed the ceremony. Owing to recent bereavement in the bride's family, only immediate relatives of the contracting parties were present.

MISS ANNE BROWN HORNER.

In Memoriam.

There passed into eternal repose on the 18th of October, at her home in Warrenton, Va., MISS ANNE BROWN HORNER, a member of one of the oldest and most esteemed families of Warrenton, and one identified with all of its best traditions. Amidst all the change and unrest of modern times she remained a modest but steadfast reminder of the type of womanhood bred in the simplicity and virtue of the old Virginia homes. A true gentlewoman in its best sense, which implies not only gentle blood, but a gentle heart, prompting kindly deeds and delicacy of conduct in all of the affairs of life, and which is associated in our minds with strength and honor. Blessed is the woman who wears this title worthily, and blessed is she who bore it through a long life without blot or stain, and who in Christian faith entered another world with the sweet assurance of a little child who goes to the home of its father.

DR. EDWARD McGUIRE.

Ever since St. Paul sanctified the calling of medicine by referring to St. Luke as the "beloved physician," there have from time to time appeared those who have illuminated that profession and fully deserved that endearing epithet, and in their lives and ministration have earned the title applied by an apostle to an evangelist.

Such an one was DR. EDWARD McGUIRE, who passed from death unto life on October 6, and in so doing left a gap in the heart of his friends, who are numbered by the hundred, that can never be filled.

For thirty-five years he had practiced his profession in Richmond, and had given of himself to his patients with such untiring devotion and sympathetic kindliness that they now mourn the loss of a dear friend, as well as miss the skill of a medical expert.

St. James' Church, Richmond, was filled on the afternoon of October 9 with those who wished to pay their last tribute to their "beloved physician," who has now passed on to those joys which "eye hath not seen nor ear heard" in the great hereafter.

the medical fraternity, the president of the Wyoming Credit Rating Association, the president of the Chamber of Commerce, the presidents and the chairmen of the civic committees of the Rotary Club and the Lions Club, the president of the Young Men's Literary Club, the president of the Woman's Club, the president of the Ministerial Association of the Protestant bodies of the city, a representative of the Roman Catholics, the mayor, the sheriff, the prosecuting attorney, the scoutmaster of the Boy Scouts, the president of the Southside Improvement Association, and the commandant at Fort D. A. Russell.

Dixon: On September 4 was held the first service in the new St. Paul's Church, Dixon. The building problem in Dixon is very serious, as all material must be hauled from the railroad over sixty miles away. However, the enterprising people of Dixon, under the leadership of their vicar, who was also the architect, the Rev. Frederick C. Wissenbach, have completed a beautiful little compound. The old church has been moved and joined to the rectory and now serves as the parish house. The new church is also joined to the parish house and stands parallel to the rectory, the parish house forming the back of the three-sided square which has a depth of twenty feet.

Acme: As the result of a mission held in Acme by the Rev. Samuel E. West and Mr. Thomas E. Winecoff, a petition has been signed by fifty-three residents, asking the Bishop to establish regular services of the Church in this place. Mr. West is going to Acme for regular Sunday night services, and the people are laying plans for the building of a church at no distant date.

Personal Notes

The Rev. E. H. Merriman, formerly of the Diocese of Chicago, is now an instructor in the DuBose Memorial Church Training School, Monteagle, Tenn., and should be addressed accordingly.

The Rev. C. P. Sparling, formerly of Georgetown Parish, Washington, has begun his work as rector of the Church of the Prince of Peace, Baltimore, and has already met with an enthusiastic welcome.

The Rev. Percy Coulhurst, vicar of the Advent Chapel, Baltimore, and formerly a master in Rothesay Diocesan School, New Brunswick, Can., has been appointed headmaster of the Boys' School of St. Paul's Parish, Baltimore.

The Rev. Frank R. Ridout, for four years rector of Holy Trinity and St. George's Churches, and for a shorter time of St. Michael's, in Accomac County, Va., is, on the advice of his physician, retiring from the active ministry for a year, and is, therefore forced to decline the call recently extended him to St. John's Church, Halifax (Houston), Va.

The Rev. J. W. Ware, after spending two weeks in Garfield Hospital, Washington, D. C., has returned to his home near Berryville, Va. The doctor anticipates decided benefit to his health.

The Rev. Henry H. Marsden, former curate of St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, has taken charge of St. Mary's Church, St. Louis.

At the recent meeting of the Board of Trustees of the University of South Carolina it was determined to confer the degree of Doctor of Divinity upon the Rev. William Way, rector of Grace Church, Charleston, S. C.

The Rev. Benjamin N. Bird, of Gwynedd, Pa., has accepted the call to the Church of St. Asaph, Bala, Pa.

The Rev. Philip Ayres Dales, formerly vicar of St. John's Church, Mt. Rainier, Md., in St. Matthew's Parish, Hyattsville, is now assistant at St. Stephen's Church, Washington, D. C. His address is 1629 Newton Street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

The Very Rev. Carroll M. Davis has left St. Louis for New York City, where he begins his work as Domestic Secretary of the Department of Missions.

The Rev. Maurice Picard, Ph. D., who has become curate of Holyrood Church, New York City, will continue as lecturer in Philosophy at Barnard College, Columbia University, and may be addressed at 96 Ryerson Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Rev. R. E. Page has entered upon his work as the assistant to the Rev. William Norman Guthrie, rector of St. Mark's-in-the-Bouwerie, New York City. Mr. Page, who is of Canadian birth and was educated in King's University, comes from a successful ministry at St. Mark's Church, Detroit, Mich.

The Rev. J. W. H. Herritage, of All Saints' Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., has accepted the rectorship of St. James' Church, Callicoon, N. Y.

The Rev. S. E. Prentiss, formerly rector of St. Martin's Parish, Hanover County, Va., has accepted the charge of Ritchie Memorial Church, Claremont, Va., and St. Mary's Church, Sandy Point, Va., and took charge on November 1.

The Rev. Robert MacD. Kirkland, deacon, who has been for the past few months in charge of the work at Surry, Dendron, Wakefield and Waverly, in the Diocese of Southern Virginia, has accepted the position of assistant to the Rev. Dr. W. Russell Bowie, rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond.

Ordinations.

In St. Alban's Church, Manistique, Diocese of Marquette, Mr. Don Copeland was ordered deacon by the Bishop of Marquette, the Rt. Rev. Robert L. Harris, D. D., on October 11. He was presented by the Rev. W. C. Seitz. The Epistle was read by Archdeacon Spalding and the Gospel by the newly ordained candidate. The Rev. William Poyseor assisted. The Rev. P. C. Bailey read the Preface, and the Litany was said by the Rev. R. F. McDowell. The Rev. G. S. Walton was master of ceremonies. The Rev. Don Copeland had been lay reader in charge of the Crystal Falls and Iron River Missions until shortly before his ordination he was transferred to Manistique. The work at Manistique is full of much promise.

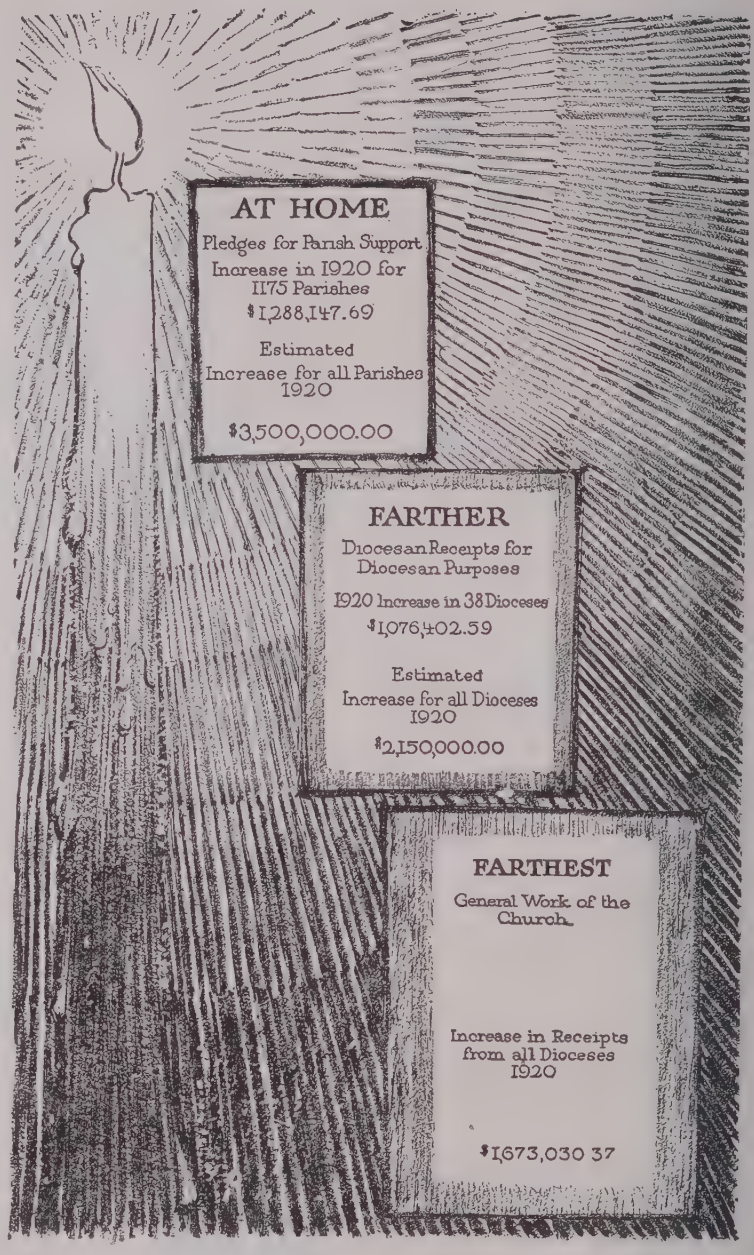
¶The Every Member Canvass will be held throughout the Church on November 20th.



¶This is the last Canvass of the triennium and the last Canvass before the next General Convention.

¶It should be borne in mind that it is also the first Canvass of the new Missionary Century.

¶An Every Member Canvass should be held annually, because experience has shown that otherwise there is a loss of contributors; because there are new members; because some will desire to increase their pledges and some may be obliged to decrease them; because it promotes fellowship.

¶The Nation-Wide Campaign methods have never failed when given a complete application.

¶The effort is to secure support for God's work. Therefore the main reliance is Prayer.

The Light That Shines Farthest Shines Brightest At Home.

¶"For those who have accepted its challenge and made an effort to catch its spirit," says Bishop Johnson, "the Nation-Wide Campaign has given a larger vision of what the Lord Christ expects of Christians—and has given them a greater joy in His personal service. It has not done anything for those persons, parishes and places who have ignored it."

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

A perfect science, perfect philosophy and perfect theology would perfectly coincide with each other, and religion will be consistent with all.

Calm Soul of all things! make it mine
To feel amid the city's jar,
That there abides a peace of Thine
Man did not make and cannot mar.
—Matthew Arnold.

The answer of prayer may be, as it was to St. Paul, not the removal of the thorn, but instead a growing insight into its meaning and value. The voice of God in our soul may show us, as we look up to Him, that His strength is enough, to enable us to bear it.—J. F. Clarke.

You don't have to go to heathen lands today to find false gods. America is full of them. Whatever you make most of is your god. Whatever you love more than God is your idol. Rich and poor, learned and unlearned, all classes of men and women are guilty of this sin.—D. L. Moody.

The beauties of nature, the mighty grandeur of the mountains, the quiet strength of the trees, the endless freedom of the ocean, and the majesty of the winding rivers, may fill you with awe for the great intelligence that is working through them, but you will never know that Intelligence through these outer wonders. You must go within, to the secret place, and commune with that Intelligence yourself. You will then better understand the beauties of nature, because you will understand God back of them. You will find God in your room, or in your office, to be just as wonderful as He is in nature. When you have found Him within, you will see Him everywhere.—Weekly Unity.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., NOVEMBER 12, 1921. No. 46

ANOTHER DEBT TO THE FEDERAL COUNCIL

Some weeks ago we commented upon the relationship of our Church to the Federal Council of the Churches. We stated the reason why it seemed to us that we were playing an ungenerous part in that relationship. As a part of the whole body of Christendom in America, we are being helped in knowledge and in power to serve through that great co-operative agency, and we are not adequately contributing to its support. We said then, and are glad to reiterate now, that the next General Convention should be asked definitely to assume in the Church's budget a proper contribution from this Church to the Federal Council.

The history of this immediate time exemplifies afresh the part which the Council can play in the effective ministry of the whole body of Christ. What can individual churches do in relation to the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments, about to assemble in Washington? Very little. In the first place, the individual communions are, for the most part, not adequately equipped with either research or publicity departments which can be quickly effective in gathering material for discussion and in presenting this rapidly to the leaders of Christian thought all over America. In the second place, even if the individual communions spoke, their separate voices would have small weight. All sorts of unconscious sectarian prejudices discount in the minds of legislators an appeal which comes from only one or two Church bodies, and those not their own.

It is only when the great fellowship of all Christian folk speaks with unanimity that it has prevailing power. It is this unanimity which the Federal Council has helped to make possible now at a moment which may be critical for the whole world's destiny. Its publicity material designed to help ministers and the leaders of Bible classes shape a constructive opinion as to the Conference on Limitation of Armaments justifies the highest praise and the fullest gratitude of the whole Church. This paper, in its issue last week, was indebted to the Federal Council for the admirable articles by Hamilton Holt and Sidney L. Gulick, as well as the figures printed under the caption, "Lest we forget." No better pamphlet to serve as a guide for the thinking of earnest people can be desired than the Federal Council's recent publication, "The Church and a Warless World." We hope that every congregation in our Church is in some way sharing the inspiration for effort which a reading of that pamphlet brings, and we hope that all who read it will remember their debt to the Federal Council and help share the determination that the next General Convention shall assume for this Church a larger obligation to the agency from which we draw so much.

FAMILY PRAYERS

One of the objectives familiar to everybody who has followed the program of the Nation-Wide Campaign this fall is the enrollment of a great number of people who will be intercessors for the Church, and especially for the Church's missions. None of us can measure the power of earnest prayer nor set limits to its inspiration. When the Nation-Wide Campaign first was launched, its ends seemed to many people beyond all reasonable hope of attainment. It was only when men and women began to pray about it that there came to them a quiet confidence in the practicability of God's great adventure, and it is safe to say that those Dioceses in which the giving of the Nation-Wide Campaign has been most generous are those in which there has been most earnest prayer.

To attain the full objectives of the Nation-Wide Campaign this fall, prayer is still essential. It is essential if we are going to furnish the new volunteers called for in the ministry and in the mission fields. It is essential if we are going to lift up our thought to a new recognition of our stewardship and a willingness to adopt the principle of giving a definite and adequate proportion of all our income to the work of the Lord.

In relation to this need of prayer we have received from the rector of St. Paul's Church, Rochester, a member of the Department of Religious Education in the Diocese of Western New York, a letter which we should like to share with our readers:

"Feeling profoundly convinced that the rebuilding of the family altar lies at the basis of our entire responsibility in furthering the mission of the Church, I beg to suggest that you give to this manual and to the subject which it represents such space and comment as may call to the attention of others who may either wish to use this manual or follow the lead of the Diocese of Virginia and the Diocese of Western New York in this matter.

"We are convinced that the problems of the increase of the ministry, a deeper loyalty and devotion in reference to the public services of the Church, and a stronger sense of personal responsibility with reference to the mission of the Church, will all be solved in large measure if the Church can succeed in leading her membership to rebuild the family altar and make it the center and source of daily inspiration and strength."

There can be no truer message than this. The Church can rise no higher than its homes. If the fires of holy purpose are to be lighted in the congregation, they must be lighted at the family altars first. Often ministers have felt a great desire to persuade their people to adopt, or to set up again if they once had had it and have lost it, the habit of family prayer. The appeal this fall of the Nation-Wide Campaign for intercessors, and the practical material which is at hand to help those fathers and mothers who really are willing to establish family prayers if only they knew how, furnish the occasion and the means by which the beautiful old custom may once again be made familiar.

THE CONSECRATION OF POWER

It has been an unhappy fact that sometimes religion has been identified with passivity. According to that conception, a man is accounted good if he does nothing wrong. The chief emphasis upon the individual life is that it should keep itself from moral delinquency. The chief emphasis for the Church is that it should be conservative and safe.

But this is not the meaning of religion. Religion means a life full-orbed. It means what the Master promised—life more abundant, life lived in all the amplitudes of its power. It is a great thing for a life to be filled with energies, even though those energies at first be rude, untamed and sorely needing much discipline from the Lord. It is better to have a blundering strength than an innocuous weakness. Certainly the Master thought so. He did not choose any pale examples of negative virtue for His disciples. He chose James and John, who though one of them became long afterwards the interpreter and very symbol of Christian love, were so volcanic and fiery-tempered when He took them that men called them the "Sons of Thunder." He chose Simon Peter, the rugged and impetuous. He chose Matthew, the man of the world. Every single disciple whose traits are clear cut in the New Testament delineation are men of power—virile, striving men. And that surely is what the great Captain of all good life wants His disciples still to be. He does not want our ambitions and our energies stifled. He wants them enlarged, inspired, consecrated. There is no outgoing of brave, true human effort which may not become a part of the plans of God, and may not be a walging with God upon His ways of service. One of the blessed contributions of the Reformation was its new emphasis upon this sacredness of those callings which the mediaeval Church had looked down upon as secular. It was the message of the priesthood of all believers, the glory that could rest upon the common life. It is a very striking fact, as one goes through the art galleries of Holland, where the influence of the Reformation spirit was strong, to see the extraordinary difference in subjects between those glorious paintings of the Dutch and Flemish masters just after the Reformation, and the paintings of the mediaeval artists in the centuries before. Before the Reformation times the only subjects that a painter ever thought worthy of his art were madonnas and saints, and other figures of religious legend and tradition. But after the Reformation men began to paint the common life—the home, the shop, the street, the wind-mills, the canals, and all the busy background of the life of every day. This was no accident. It was the reflection of a new spiritual understanding. It was the lifting up into the high symbolism of art of the great recovered message that all the outgoing of the energies of men might be beautiful in the sight of the Eternal.

Oh, that today, in this needul time, we might carry out to its true expression this message of the possible holiness of all great outgoings! We expect certain ambitions to be hallowed. We expect the minister to be a servant of God, first of all, and not of his own selfish advantage. We expect the same thing of the doctor, of the teacher, of the jurist; but we have not learned it yet in all our life. We still speak and act too often as though it were a normal thing for the great virile energies of men to go unconsecrated. We talk of business as being business, and nothing more. We do not see in all its startling awfulness the tragedy of the soul's betrayal when a lad deliberately makes the choice of his career not upon principles of service, but simply upon considerations of where he can make most money and make it quickest. We are satisfied if the successful man of affairs gives a part of his profits to religious and philanthropic enterprises, and have not learned yet to require that all our daily practices shall square with the motives of the Kingdom of God. Yet this is what the message of Christian consecration must mean. On all our outgoings God may be with us, and it is a stultification of our real selves if we are content with any road on which He does not go. The world needs today its great ministers. It needs its Christian teachers. It needs equally its business men who are Christians, not only in their formal creed, but in their imaginative and constant effort to interpret the spirit of Jesus, and realize the motives of His Kingdom in the midst of their every-day affairs. Then all strength, all effort, all wisdom, all business, all statesmanship, should be an holy thing, and the Kingdom should begin to come with power.

HEADS OF CHURCHES UNITE IN NOTABLE APPEAL

FOR the first time, so far as known, the moderators and presiding officers of the Protestant bodies of the country have united in a joint appeal to the nation on a great public issue. The moral necessity for a reduction of armaments is the subject which has called forth this remarkable utterance.

The action grew out of a conference of the moderators and presiding officers called by the Federal Council of the Churches to consider together how the churches could carry out the most effective program in behalf of reduction of armaments and a warless world. The statement, which at that time it was agreed should be made, and which was issued on November 5, is as follows:

An Appeal to All Lovers of Humanity.

"So momentous are the issues of the coming Conference on Limitation of Armament, and so fateful for all the higher interests of mankind, that we unite in this joint statement to express to our own nation and the world what we feel to be the deep convictions of the churches.

"We have come to a fork in the highway of human history. To the left lies the old way of suspicion, jealousy and selfishness. To the right, the way of mutual trust, co-operation and brotherhood. The first road requires growing armaments and leads to the horrors of another war. The second requires agencies of international law and justice and leads to a warless world.

"The conference is to deal with difficult and complex problems of politics and economics. But underlying them all are eternal moral principles of international life. We firmly believe that nations no less than individuals are subject to God's immutable moral laws; that only through just dealing and unselfish service can people achieve true welfare, greatness and honor; that for nations as well as individuals, goodwill and mutual helpfulness are the true way of life. No considerations of political expediency or of selfish economic advantage can supersede these basic principles without bringing ultimate disaster and ruin in their train.

"In the light of these principles at least four clear tasks seem to us to lie before our nation and the nations of the world:

"Some rational and pacific method for the settlement of every international dispute must now be found. War we regard as an intolerable evil which we can no longer endure, and which we must definitely set ourselves to banish from the earth.

"A sweeping reduction of armaments we hold to be an imperative necessity. The present riot of expenditure on armies and battleships throughout the world, at a time when all our resources are needed for constructive tasks, even at a time when millions of men are dying of starvation, we regard as a sin against humanity for which we all alike need humbly to repent. Worse still, competitive armaments will lead again, as in the past they always have, to the distrust and suspicion that nourish the seeds of future war.

"For the perplexing problems of the Pacific acceptable solutions must now be found. If causes of irritation be not removed, if jealousy and fear be allowed to spread till they lead at last to conflict in arms, it would mean not only all the unspeakable evils of every war, but also the death knell of the great enterprise of Christian missions which through years of patient and unselfish service have been breaking down barriers between race and race and ministering to international brotherhood.

"More than all else, there is need for a new spirit in our international life. Penitence there must be, first of all, for our own past sin in thinking too much of our own rights and others' duties, too little of our own duties and others' rights. We must learn to think of our nation not as an end in itself, but as a member of a family of nations under a common Father. All unneighborly attitudes toward other peoples, all prejudice against other races, must be put away. Our hearts must be open to the incoming of the divine spirit of love which alone can bring lasting peace to a world, torn by war and staggering under the colossal burden of unnecessary armaments.

"We bespeak the active co-operation in mind and heart and will of all lovers of humanity in the achievement of these great ends."

ON THE EVE OF A GREAT OPPORTUNITY FOR THE CHURCH

By Samuel McCrea Cavert,

Secretary Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America

WITHOUT exaggeration, it may be truly said that on the Washington Conference may hang the course of human history for a hundred years to come. It is plain and sober truth that civilization itself is in the balance. Unless the next war can be averted now, the ruin which we only barely escaped in the last conflict will stare the world full in the face.

In the midst of our high hopes there is a growing anxiety lest the outcome of the conference prove disappointing. Disquieting remarks are heard concerning the impracticability of any far-reaching results. The culmination of this tendency to dampen popular expectations finds expression in one of our great newspapers which even deprecates the earnest efforts being made to arouse an intelligent public opinion on the momentous issue. In effect it seems to say, "Run along, childish idealists, and do not embarass the practical men whom the governments have appointed to attend to the matter."

For the Church, at least, this will never do! Detailed solutions, indeed, must be left to statesmen, but insist we must, with all the power at our command, that some genuine solution of the problems of international life must now be reached, some Christian substitute found for the method of competitive armament and fratricidal war. To do otherwise would be to fail in bearing witness to the gospel of our Lord and its meaning for our contemporary life

Practical considerations also lead us in the same direction, for the one hope of constructive results from the conference lies in public sentiment. Certainly no great action is likely to be taken except as the result of an unmistakable demand from the masses of the people.

If it be objected that we ought shrewdly to conceal our earnest enthusiasm lest we create an impression on foreign governments that reduction of armaments will come in America, whether they take similar action or not, the answer is clear: no such scheming and calculating spirit can furnish an atmosphere in which unselfish and disinterested decisions can possibly be reached. Even if it should result in reduction of armament, through fear of what the United States might otherwise do, it could never result in peace, for we would have been playing upon the notes of suspicion and distrust which have always produced war in the past and always will. The best diplomacy for the United States today is no "diplomacy" at all. Only a great tide of Christian idealism, calling out similar idealism in other peoples, can give the upward turn for which the whole world longs. If that idealism be not found in our own nation, which planned the conference, which is its host, which is furthest removed from the dead hand of the past, where can we expect it to be found at all?

And how shall it be found here if it is not found, full and strong and at its height, in the Christian Church? The oft-quoted words of General Tasker H. Bliss call us to our knees in penitence and prayer. "The responsibility is entirely on the professing Christians of the United States. If another war like the last one should come, they will be responsible." Severe as the words sound, they will be true unless we bend our utmost energy, now and during months to come, to mobilize a mighty tide of Christian public opinion throughout the land.

For the task of securing a rational and pacific method of settling international disputes, in place of the mailed fist, is not one that can be accomplished by machinery. It is a great spiritual enterprise. The trouble is, at bottom, a spiritual trouble: the attitude of fear, of suspicion, of selfishness, which pervades our international life. So the remedy must be a spiritual one—the acceptance of an attitude toward life not yet generally accepted in our economic, industrial and international affairs. This goes to the very foundation of men's thinking, requiring of us that we regard our own nation not as the final end-in-itself, but as a member of a brotherhood of nations meant to live in mutual helpfulness under a common Father.

More, then, than anything else, the world today needs faith. Faith in the workableness of the way of brotherhood revealed to us in Jesus Christ. Faith in the vast possibilities of this conference for securing a thoroughgoing reduction of armament and a constructive plan for co-operation among the nations of the earth. To call men to such faith surely is the task of the Christian Church.

And let us not think for a moment that when November 11 is past our task is done. It will only be begun. For weeks, months, we must ceaselessly insist that a great Christian principle is at stake. For weeks, months, we must be studying international questions in the light of the Christian gospel. For weeks, months, we must be in earnest prayer for divine guidance. "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit will be saying to the churches."

THE REVIVAL AT RHEIMS

By Henry Van Dyke

AN event with a large meaning took place at Rheims on Sunday, October 23. It may fill but little space in the columns of foreign news; but its deeper significance ought to be noted and felt in America.

Famous for its great cathedral, celebrated as the chief wool market of France and the center of champagne production, renowned for its obstinate, heroic resistance and suffering during the World War, the city of Rheims stands out as a type of French art, industry and patriotism. A hundred thousand people lived and labored there before the war; about four thousand of them were Protestants. When France was invaded, all the able-bodied men were drawn into the army defense, and the rest of the inhabitants, old men, women and children, were scattered far and wide, or driven underground for refuge in the vast "caves" in the chalk rock which underlies the city. In these subterranean asylums the indomitable remnant found shelter for four years while their homes overhead were wrecked by a continued, cruel, senseless bombardment. Underground the children of those dark years were born and nursed, brave little schools were carried on, and divine worship was conducted. All this ruin in the daylight and distress in the dark were part of the price that France paid to save mankind from the menace of the Hohenzollern sword.

Every shell that made its barbarous mark on the beauty of the cathedral awakened an echo of resentment in the heart of the civilized world. But there were other deeds of destruction wrought by the invaders which, though less known, were no less deserving of a just and humane indignation. The Protestant church at Rheims, the beloved "house of prayer" for a laborious community of the descendants of the Huguenots, was not merely marred and broken, but utterly destroyed; and with it the modest parsonage and the indispensable Young Men's Christian Association building went down in total ruin under the ruthless fire of the enemy.

Now the tempest has passed. The refugees have returned to Rheims, ready to revive their city's life. The Catholics are repairing the great cathedral. The Protestants, who were among the first to come back, are keeping up their fellowship and their simple worship in a wooden barrack, and making generous offerings to rebuild their house of prayer. Out of their poverty they have gathered 250,000 francs, and friends have contributed 200,000 more. On October 23 they laid the cornerstone of their new church, a fitting, beautiful, commodious edifice, which is to rise like a shrine of remembrance, on the very site where the old church met its martyrdom.

American thank offerings have helped in this revival. But to complete the restoration there is need of something more. Beside the church, and to replace the destroyed Y. M. C. A. building, there must be a model parish house, well equipped with rooms for the Sunday school and for the young men's and the young women's associations, mothers' meetings, boys' clubs, and so on. It should contain both a library and a gymnasium; in effect, it should be fitted for the social work of a modern church in an ancient city, revived and advancing bravely after the bitter trials of war. A hundred thousand dollars will do it. Such a building as this would be a noble memorial to any of those fine, forward-looking American boys who gave their lives to the cause of liberty on the soil of France. It would help to realize and perpetuate the ideals of faith for which they made their great sacrifice.

Protestant Christians in the United States do not fully appreciate how much the Protestants of France suffered during the war, nor how well they are doing their duty under difficulties now. Of the four hundred churches belonging to the Evangelical Reformed Communion, thirty-five were partially wrecked and twelve totally destroyed. To meet the increased cost of living these French Protestants have raised their annual church budget from 1,000,000 francs in 1912 to 3,000,000 in 1920. At the same time they have doubled their foreign missionary work, advancing from 900,000 francs in 1914 to 1,800,000 in 1920. These people are not slackers and leaners. They are workers and self-helpers. They are worthy of sympathy and aid, because they carry such a heavy burden so bravely. They are laboring in the common cause of human welfare which is dear to all true believers.

The laying of the cornerstone of the new church at Rheims is an evidence of faith surviving and reviving among the ruins. It ought to call out a generous practical expression of admiration and gratitude from Christians who hold a like faith in America. Many gifts, large and small, should be sent to the Federal Council's Commission on Relations with France and Belgium, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City. The need is real. The appeal is strong. The investment is splendid.

MOBILIZING FOR SERVICE

THE American Red Cross, in 1917, was American manhood and womanhood mobilized for service as the army and navy mobilized for victory. What service was rendered to our fighting men, to their anxious families at home, to the millions of terrified and homeless refugees in France and Belgium and Serbia, in Italy and Rumania and Poland and Greece, every one knows. But the Red Cross, "the union of those who love in the service of those who suffer," has never been demobilized. There is still work for it to do, and the field for that work is widening every day. Service, in peace as in war, is still its watchword.

What the peace service is, what fields it covers, what appeals it answers, can best be realized by a glance over the work of the Red Cross for the past year. The first and greatest appeal comes from the war veterans.

The highest and greatest obligation that the nation and the American Red Cross face today is the problem of the disabled service man. The number of these men is increasing continually as hitherto hidden disabilities assert themselves and an average of a thousand men a month are reporting for hospital treatment. Many thousands more are scattered throughout the country, and the task which faces the Red Cross is to seek out these men in their homes, advise them of the aid that the government desires to give them, and in every way assist them in obtaining that aid. There were 26,300 ex-service men in hositals on June 27, 1921. There are 2,397 Red Cross chapters which maintain a service for the war veterans, and during the past year 1,508,640 men were given help. Headquarters handled 148,032 allotment, compensation and insurance claims, and delivered 63,655 allotment checks to men who had moved from addresses furnished to the War Risk Insurance Bureau. There are 448 Red Cross workers in government hospitals where the disabled soldiers are under care. And last year the Red Cross loaned $450,000 to 32,495 men under the Federal Board for Vocational Training.

At the request of the government, the American Red Cross holds the reserve out of which are recruited the Army and Navy Nursing Corps in time of war.

During the war it assembled, equipped, uniformed and assigned 19,877 nurses to active service with our army and navy.

It holds now upon its list 37,787 registered nurses subject to call.

During the past two years it has assigned 1,163 nurses to the United States Public Health Service for the care of disabled service men.

It has trained, equipped and assigned 1,335 Red Cross public health nurses to the service of chapters and communities throughout the country.

It has furnished 1,726 instructors in Home Hygiene and Care of the Sick, from whom during the past year 258,710 women and girls have received short, intensive courses, whose effect will be vastly increased efficiency in the prevention and combating of diseases.

It is sending overseas constantly nurses to join the medical units working among the destitute children of Central and Eastern Europe. It is establishing and supporting, throughout these war-torn countries, training schools for native nurses.

It is carrying on constantly a campaign in behalf of the enlistment of student nurses among the young women of the country.

The 1,335 public health nurses made during the year 1,144,692 visits to homes, examined half a million school children, and nursed 499,800 patients.

The nutrition service of the Red Cross is being developed in response to the general awakening to the need for more intelligent application of the principles of nutrition to every-day life.

Physicians' examinations have shown that 20 per cent. of the school children of this country are below normal weight. To aid in meeting this situation three chapter activities have been developed; nutrition classes for under-nourished children, hot lunches for schools, and a course in food selection for the mothers.

The service has enrolled up to date 2,514 trained Home Economics teachers to carry on these activities.

During the past year 22,000 under-nourished children have been enrolled in 1,114 classes, and 163 classes in food selection have been organized, from which women have been certificated.

There are 260 chapters in which health centers are established.

Health lectures given in such centers	4,015
Health exhibits held in such centers	780
Clinics held in such centers	6,264
Persons attending clinics	90,252

The work of the Red Cross in first aid is too well known to need explaining. More than half a million railroad employees alone have taken the Red Cross course, and many large industrial and public service corporations, such as the Bell Telephone Company, have made it part of the training of their employees. Last year 5,100 classes were held, 20,172 persons certificated, and 104,495 students enrolled.

No one can ever tell when or where disasters will strike. Their horror lies in their suddenness. In its work of organizing for prompt relief in disasters the Red Cross has established supply bases at various strategic points throughout the country, from which food, medicine and relief supplies can be shipped at an hour's notice to the affected area. There are 328 chapters which have disaster preparedness committees, so organized that volunteers and supplies and transportation are always available. There were seventy disasters during the past eighteen months, and in caring for the dead and injured and providing shelter for the homeless the Red Cross expended $1,600,000. One hundred and seventy-seven chapters last year had to meet disaster emergencies and forty-eight chapters rendered aid outside of their own communities.

The women of 1,613 chapters are still carrying on the production of garments, so many millions of which were made during the war. Last year 1,317,528 surgical dressings, 56,486 layettes and 551,680 garments were made and shipped to Europe. Moreover, working in co-operation with the American Friends Relief Committee, they are collecting used garments and shoes of all kinds to be shipped abroad for the millions of children in Eastern and Central Europe who have not even rags to clothe themselves in this winter.

Realizing that it is impossible for any one organization to stem the tide of misery in Europe, the American Red Cross has now cencentrated its efforts and money on the children. Ten million dollars has been appropriated by the organization for medical nursing and welfare relief for the millions of children who need this care. In Poland alone there are 800,000 war orphans and as many again who need food, clothing and medical help. A very large percentage of all Polish children are tuberculous. It is an unusual thing to find a healthy-looking child. Starvation and exposure have left a terrible heritage in shrunken bodies, twisted and distorted limbs and crooked spines.

Austria and Hungary have a million children with no one to minister to their necessity. Throughout the Balkans the distress is just as great. In Serbia, Montenegro and Albania more than half the children are orphans.

Upon these sick, famished, naked babies of the old world rests its civilization of the future. The work of the American Red Cross among them is almost entirely medical and nursing, but it is also undertaking to furnish soap, clothing and other things which tend to prevent disease. Ninety welfare units, made up of doctors, nurses and field workers, have already been placed at strategic points ministering to the children in the districts of which their posts is a center. Medical Unit No. 4, stationed in Kolasin, Montenegro, a small town of 1,800 people, served during the month of May 50,000 people in that vicinity.

In Europe also during the past year, the American Red Cross has been engaged in general relief work in Poland, the Baltic States, Austria, Hungary and in parts of the Balkans and among the thousands of Russian refugees at various points. It also completed the restoration of their families in Soviet Russia of 780 Russian children it had rescued from starvation in Siberia. In China during the year the American Red Cross, by building 903 miles of roadways, paid for the labor of some 74,000 workmen with food for themselves and relatives, more than 600,000 men, women and children were fed through the critical famine period. For this relief the American Red Cross made an appropriation of $1,000,000. To the American Committee for Relief in Ireland it appropriated $100,000 to be disbursed under the direction of the committee.

The need for such efficient, disinterested service is very great. The appeals are more insistent than ever before. But unless the American people support it, the Red Cross work will not continue.

The mobilization for service is voluntary; it consists merely in enrolling in the Red Cross organization, and paying the dollar membership dues for the year. The annual roll call will be held this year from the 11th to the 24th of November. The cost is so little; the service so great. Won't you do your share by joining?

The Southern Division.

One hundred and forty-four thousand nine hundred and ninety-four men who served in the armed forces of the Unite States during the World War have been aided in their fight to get back to normal life in the past six months by chapters of the Southern Division of the American Red Cross. During the same period 21,280 disabled soldiers, still in the service, largely men who are recovering in government hospitals, have been helped through the same agency. These figures were given out by the Southern Division headquarters for the first half year of its operations.

This work was carried on in the widest possible scope. No soldier problem was too small; nor were there any too large. The Red Cross was always willing to help in obtaining compensation, vocational training, hospital treatment, maintaining family ties while the veteran was recovering his usefulness, making the dull routine of hospital life endurable, finding employment, providing the human touch everywhere.

NEAR EAST RELIEF

WILL we finish the job President Wilson started on April 4, 1917—to make the world a decent place to live in?

The armistice has been signed, arms have been laid down and most civilized countries are engaged in "getting on their feet" again. But there are two little nations in the Near East still suffering the horrors of brutal warfare—more ruthless than the Germans practice on little Belgium and devastated France.

Armenia and Syria are being ravaged and ravaged again by the Turks, families are being rent asunder, men massacred and women forced into the Turkish harems, crops ruined, stock and food stolen and disease spread rampant.

Armenia is not a decent place to live in. Neither is Syria.

Through the darkest period any peoples ever passed there appears one little ray of hope. It is American Relief. Thousands of lives have been saved, thousands restored from disease to health, thousands of miserable lives made brighter—all through the work of the Near East Relief.

These two brave Christian nations have been ravaged by the Turks simply for their refusal to renounce Christ and all He stood for and become Mohammedans. For a thousand years the Armenians have been persecuted, but never with the thoroughness, brutality and ruthlessness of the latter-day Turks. But, through the thousand years of persecution, torture, murder and lust there is no record of even one Armenian forsaking Christ for the religion of the "bully" nation.

The war in Europe gave the unspeakable Turk a fine chance to multiply his cruelties, and with the signing of the armistice he did not stop. With no crops, no industries, no live stock and little or no food or clothing, the people of the stricken Bible lands are in a pitiable plight. Volunteer workers of the Near East Relief on the ground are distributing gifts of food and clothing from the American people in a manner to do as much good as possible.

But much more must be done to put these people "on their feet" again and help them to become a self-supporting nation. Sixty dollars will feed and clothe a child for a year—such is the efficiency of the Near East Relief. Think of performing such a feat here.

For every five dollars you give one child will be kept alive, well fed, well clothed and as happy as he or she can be under the circumstances for a whole month. Workers in the Levant, who cannot take care of half the pitiable cases at their very doors, are continually calling for more food and clothing as they come into daily contact with the most heart-rending misery.

The Near East Relief is the only relief organization operating in Armenia—a country which stood staunchly by the Allies in the late war and which has stood steadfastly by Christianity for 1,000 years. It is the only relief organization chartered and supervised by the Congress of the United States, outside of the American Red Cross.

Armenia only wants to keep its population from starving or freezing to death and dying from disease until its industries can be rebuilt and crops planted and harvested.

The treasurer of the Virginia Division, Near East Relief, is Waller Holladay, 209 American National Bank, Richmond.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

THE BISHOP ROWE FOUNDATION FUND.

Mr. Editor: After careful consideration it has been decided to keep the above fund open until General Convention in September, 1922.

So many requests have come from all parts of the country asking for an opportunity to share in this tribute to the hero-Bishop of Alaska.

All checks should be sent to Mr. Stephen Baker, 40 Wall Street, New York City, who is treasurer of this fund. Up to the present about $35,000, in round figures, have been contributed, and it is hoped that within a short time the $50.000 mark will be reached

WALTER TAYLOR SUMNER,
Bishop of Oregon, Vice-Chairman.

Portland, Ore.

THE HOME FOR BOYS.

Mr. Editor: Please permit me to acknowledge the receipt of $6,000, just received from the Treasurer of the Presiding Bishop and Council, being the first installment on their appropriation made on July 13 for $25,000. It is understood that the remainder will be paid over by the last of December.

By the agreement made between the special committee of the Presiding Bishop and Council and the joint committee from the Dioceses of Southern Virginia and Southwestern Virginia, the entire sum appropriated, $25,000, must be applied to the reduction of the debt for construction. It will be so applied.

As we have 132 boys in the Home, and many of them have nothing provided for their maintenance, it becomes necessary for us to seek substantial gifts for daily bread. Many have thought that the help from the Nation-Wide Campaign was for the operating cost of the Home. This is not true, in so far as it is set out above, and at present no other source of help from the Church seems open.

Let me urge you to make gifts to the Home so that we may feed the boys and pay the meagre salaries to those who, in the Master's name, spend themselves for His children.

Send your checks to Mr. E. Kunz, Treasurer, Home for Boys, Covington, Va.

GEORGE FLOYD ROGERS, President.

Lynchburg, Va., Oct. 1, 1921.

"THE FIRST ENGLISH BAPTISM IN AMERICA."

Mr. Editor: On page 372 of the September issue of "St. Andrew's Cross," in a very interesting article, occurs the statement, "In the church at Jamestown occurred * * * the first baptism (1609) * * *." That is a mistake. Hakluyt's "Principall Navigations, Voiages, and Discoveries of the English Nation," in its account of "The Fourth Voiage made to Virginia, in the Yere 1587, by Governor John White," narrates:

"The 13th of August" (1587) "our Savage, Manteo, by the commandment of Sir Walter Ralegh, was christened in Roanoak, and called Lord thereof, and of Dasamonguepeuk, in reward of his faithful services. The 18th, Elenor, daughter to the Governour, and Wife to Ananias Dare, one of the Assistants, was delivered of a daughter in Roanoak, and the same was christened there the Sonday following, and because this child was the first Christian borne in Virginia, shee was named Virginia."

The North Carolina State Board of Education has employed Miss Grimball to stage a pageant of the attempts of the English to colonize on Roanoke Island. The pageant has been taken in moving pictures and will soon be presented, primarily for the public schools of the State.

Report to the Church on the Work of the Commission on Registration and Reference of Church Workers

The Church Personnel Bureau, Inc., which was organized by the Rev. Arthur W. Brooks, and operated for twenty months, endeavored to secure the endorsement of the last General Convention. In this connection the convention adopted the following:

"Therefore be it resolved, the House of Deputies concurring, that a joint committee be appointed, to consist of five bishops, five presbyters and five laymen, to take under advisement the whole subject of vacancy and supply; and especially to consider the advisability of giving the endorsement of the Church to the Church Personnel Bureau, Inc., aforesaid; and to report during this present session of the General Convention." (Journal, page 71.)

This committee reported that in its opinion it was "inexpedient for the General Convention of the Church to give official endorsement to an organization which both in its origin and status is largely, if not altogether, a private enterprise, no matter how efficient such an arrangement may be." (Journal, page 184.)

The committee further recommended that there be referred to the Presiding Bishop and Council the following:

"The urgent need of a Department of Vacancy and Supply, created and controlled by the General Church, having as its principal function the establishment and operation of a bureau or bureaus from which bishops and parishes may secure full, prompt and accurate information about clergy seeking cures or temporary work." (Journal, page 184.)

In pursuance of the above, the Presiding Bishop and Council requested that the Department of Religious Education study this whole matter and appointed a commission composed of Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, D. D., Rev. William E. Gardner, D. D., John W. Wood, D. C. L., Rev. Arthur R. Gray, D. D., Rev. Franklin J. Clark, Miss Grace Lindley.

Conferences were held with the authorities of the Church Personnel Bureau, Inc., and an agreement was reached by which they turned over their office records and the papers of such registrants as gave their consent to the transfer of their files and dissolved their corporation in consideration of the payment of $1,500, which covered all the outstanding obligations of the Church Personnel Bureau, Inc., and the salary of the Executive Secretary for six months in advance.

The Commission began its work on April 12, 1920, and up to date there has been registered with us, both lay and clerical, five hundred and thirty-six persons.

Through change of plans, or the securing of work through other sources than this commission, one hundred and fifty-three names have been removed from the register (of this number forty-seven were clergy).

The Commission has made to date the reference of seven hundred and twenty-eight names (of these references three hundred and two were clergy and four hundred and twenty-six lay workers).

There is now an active list of three hundred and twenty registrants, of whom ninety-eight are clergy, nine deaconesses and two hundred and thirteen lay workers. We have classed as lay workers, teachers (grade and special subjects), Social Service workers, parish visitors, organists, workers among foreign-born Americans, office workers, matrons, house mothers, directors of Religious Education and workers among boys.

Of this active list there is now out three hundred and ninety-three references, of which one hundred and seventy-eight are clergy and two hundred and fifteen are deaconesses and lay workers.

The known placements to date are eleven clergymen, fifty lay workers and three deaconesses. This commission was instrumental in securing for work in Cuba a school teacher, a school secretary and a registered nurse. In addition, a directress of Religious Education was sent to China. Another woman worker was secured for work among the mountaineers of Virginia. As a result of a visit to the Church Missions House, one registrant is now entering his second year at a seminary.

The calls during the past year have been varied. Teachers, parish secretaries, parish visitors, Social Service workers, workers among boys, directors of Religious Education, kindergartners, hand craft workers, camp counsellors, organists, matrons and housekeepers (school).

The calls for Sunday supply were numerous and the extra help that is always needed for Lent was taken care of. There have been many calls for part time workers in churches and settlement houses and for trained teachers for Sunday work. We have met all these demands.

Little advertising has been done through the Church periodicals; it has been mostly by the registrants whom we have helped and who have told others. There is no fee attached either for registering the vacancy or for those registering their names. The work is being done for the "Church at large," and it is our hope that it will become so well known that it will be the logical place for every bishop and rector to turn when in need of help of any kind.

The Advent Corporate Communion

Once more the Brotherhood of St. Andrew suggests to the men of the Church, as its call goes forth to its own members, that they gather in their parish churches on the First Sunday in Advent (November 27) for the corporate celebration of the Holy Communion.

Last year over 66,000 cards announcing these services were procured by rectors from the Brotherhood's national headquarters for distribution among their men. And the cards are available this year to those who wish them at the usual rate of $1 per hundred. Correspondence should be had with Mr. Spencer, Executive Secretary, at the Brotherhood office, 202 South Nineteenth Street, Philadelphia.

Although separated in hundreds of parishes and missions throughout the Church, this annual celebration of the Holy Communion among her men has come to be a national event eagerly looked forward to by the clergy and laity participating, and the Brotherhood requests rectors everywhere to co-operate in furthering it among their confirmed men and boys.

Essentially a men's organization in the Church, the Brotherhood, during the nearly four decades of its history, has ever stressed the sacramental side of the Church's life; and it asks again only the privilege of being a helpful medium in order that on the coming first Sunday in the Church's new year more men and boys than ever will join in this holy sacrifice.

Mr. Cutting Makes an Interesting Address and Offers Some Progressive Suggestions

In a memorable address before the recent conference of the laymen's organization of the Episcopal Diocese of Bethlehem, Robert Fulton Cutting, a prominent layman of the Church, the successor of J. Pierpont Morgan as warden of St. George's Church, New York, disclosed some rather startling conditions and needs of the Church and mapped out a comprehensive program of work for the laymen's organization in this and other dioceses. "The death rate of a community is a true index of its Christianity," quoted Mr. Cutting, who brought out the importance of work of civic welfare by the Church, not only because the community needs the assistance of the Church, but because the Church needs the work to secure and retain the interest of the people.

Mr. Cutting's address began with the disappearance of the autocrat, the oligarchy, and the plutocrat as major influences in world affairs, and explained the emergence of the "mass mind," which he said is of greatest importance within the Church and a great advantage, provided the leaders are competent to lead. Nevertheless, though autocratic conditions are disappearing in world affairs, he said that we have within the Church, despite its democratic form of government, an autocracy, with the clergy as the autocrats, not because of any desire or aggression on their part, but because the laymen have shirked their duties. The mass mind of the Church is the laity, he said, and they are not expressing themselves as they ought. Many laymen of the Church are doing great works of charity and philanthropy outside the Church, because the program of the Church has not gripped their imaginations, nor given them an outlet for the exercises of their talents within the Church.

Let us transform the clergy from autocrats into leaders of the mass movement, said Mr. Cutting. Let us organize our congregations in a different way from that in vogue at the present. The present parochial organizations, though excellent in themselves, tend to disintegrate the congregations instead of unifying them. They tend to create circles within circles. Let congregational committees be appointed to map out a program of active work. "The death rate of a community is a true index of its Christianity," quoted Mr. Cutting. Education of mothers in child raising, clothing of children, their nourishment, etc., are greatly needed, and would save many lives. Is this not a work worth engaging in? Civil authorities appreciate co-operation of laymen if non-partisan. The Church ought to be closer to the public schools; to take an interest, to support where support is needed, to correct and reflect the will of the public if such be required.

Mr. Cutting emphasized that the Church must widen the scope of its activities, not so much that the work for community betterment can be better done by the Church, but that more of its members can find outlet for their activities in the Church's program. He said, "There is great value in the shoulder-to-shoulder mass organization." It is the only way that the fervency of the few can be communicated to the many.

The Missionary Centennial Impressively Observed in the Nations Capital

"Never in my twenty-seven years' ministry, through the length and breadth of the land, not even in the great city of New York, have I witnessed such a demonstration as this." So said Dr. Freeman in an address before the Sunday school children, teachers and officers of the Diocese of Washington gathered together at Epiphany Church on the afternoon of November 6 to celebrate the Missionary Centenial. Several thousand children gathered on the monument grounds, and, in formation of four abreast, led by a crucifier bearing the cross, interspersed with banners and flags telling of the meaning of it all, marched in parade from the monument to Epiphany Church. Music was furnished by the Boy Scout Band, and the sidewalks were lined with people watching this unique procession. The police co-operated splendidly, and traffic gave way as the children came to dangerous crossings. As the line reached Epiphany they began to file into the church, and after every spot of the church was filled, including chancel, choir stalls, aisles and galleries, the overflow number was taken care of in the parish hall. Dr. Freeman, after his address to the larger body, found his way to the parish hall, where he talked to those gathered there. Washington is accustomed to parades, but this one, on a crisp November afternoon, when thoughts were turned to the great conference and people of other nations were constantly seen on the streets, will ever stand out in the minds and hearts of those who witnessed it. Because a few dared to organize one hundred years ago for the sole purpose of preaching the gospel to every creature, several thousand children in one city made possible a great and new kind of parade. Surely this was an inspiring way to celebrate the Centennial and emphasize the part Christianity has to play in the cause of peace.

BISHOP MANNING URGES INTEREST IN DISARMAMENT: NEW YORK RECTORS INSTALLED.

Bishop Manning, who preached yesterday in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, said after the service that never had he seen such an outpouring of people in the Cathedral, certainly none with such earnestness. The Bishop, who was the preacher, began by speaking of the importance of the coming election, and of all voters taking part, and gave most of his sermon to the Centennial of the Missionary Society of his Church. Concerning disarmament, he said:

"All are thinking of the great conference now to be held in Washington. We feel, and rightly, that this may prove to be the most momentous in all history. It holds the hope of a real advance towards brotherhood and peace, and sanity among men. During the war some men said that Christianity had failed. This conference is the evidence that Christianity has not failed. The holding of the conference is the direct result of the command to go into all the world and preach the gospel. But for the preaching of the gospel in this world no such conference would have been heard of or thought of. It is a witness to the present power and influence of Jesus Christ among men.

Three institutions of rectors have just taken place. One was that of the Rev. Leighton Williams as rector of Christ Church, Marlborough, and All Saints' Church, Milton, both in the Hudson River Valley, and attended in summer by New York men of influence. Bishop Manning officiated, and was assisted by the Rev. Drs. Chew, Hobson and Kroll. Until late n life the Rev. Dr. Williams was a Baptist minister, attaining prominence in that religious body in New York City. A brother, Mr. Mornay Williams, is a foremost Baptist layman of the city, prominent on many official boards. A second institution was that of the Rev. Frank R. Jones at St. Mary's, in the lower Bronx; a large parish in what is a down town district even if far up town. Mr. Jones was for many years in the Cit yMission Society, and chaplain of one of the great hospitals of the city. A third was that of the Rev. Dr. George R. Van de Water, in charge of the Beloved Disciple Parish, already reported.

The Synod of the Fourth Province

BISHOP WOODCOCK'S PLEA FOR REGENERATION.

In point of attendance, in the inspirational addresses, in the passing of several notable resolutions, and in the progress shown in the Departments of Missions, Religious Education and Christian Social Service, the Synod of the Fourth Province, held in Savannah, Ga., October 25-27, was markedly one of the greatest ever held. The opening service was held in St. John's Church Tuesday evening, October 25, and the feature of the evening, and it might almost be said of the Synod, was the address of Dr. W. C. Sturgis on his world-wide tour of the mission field. For half an hour Dr. Sturgis held his audience spellbound while he gave glimpses of the countries through which he traveled, laying particular stress on conditions in India, China and Japan. The same evening the Rev. R. Bland Mitchell, of New York, spoke on the Nation-Wide Campaign, and called on the Church in the Fourth Province to nourish the great movement it had sponsored.

In his annual address, at the business meeting the next day, the Bishop of Kentucky, president of the Synod, dealt searchingly with the present day problems.

"There is a deep-seated unrest and dissatisfaction which is eating out the heart of humanity," said Bishop Woodcock. "It is not to be wondered at, for it arises from deferred hopes and disappointed ideals. All the material enrichment of better times is powerless to heal the unhappiness of disappointed souls. It was hoped, and by many believed, that events following the late war would lead up from darkness into light, from primal instincts and barbarous conflict to a brotherhood of man and a community of nations. From the dream of peace and goodwill, from the anticipated spiritual elevation of the whole race, there has been a rude awakening. So far as its great opportunities are concerned the world seems unprepared to use them and to have fallen back into the ruck of old habits.

"The world feels a need which victory has not satisfied. Some could forget past unrest in present prosperity. Some could banish discontent in social betterment. But to others these, at best, are only opportunities for greater things. We must go deeper and higher. We must be possessed of a faith that endures, capable of seeing in this era the hope and possibility of a new awakening. This adventure of faith is not merely an attempt at reconstruction, to see what can be salvaged out of the world's shattered system and economy. Nor even a readjustment in order to fit a disastrous past into a betangled and much bewildered present. If it be only reconstruction, then it may be only repair. If it be no more than readjustment, then it may fail to be reform. If we seek spiritual uplift and progress, we must do something more than put a new piece of cloth to an old garment.

"The deep-hungering need of the world is something more than revolution and reconstruction. What the world sorely requires is not salvage, but salvation; not reform, but religion and repentance; not only social improvement, but spiritual redemption. It has had enough of Mars, it now needs Jesus Christ. Before there is any decided change for the better there must first be a conversion and transformation in the nature of nations and of men.

"Because of disappointed ideals many men are confused and know not where to look for aid. Some are turning away from Christianity, others are looking to the Church for guidance through bewildering paths. Is modern-day Christianity equal to the glowing opportunity and the great task? Before we may hope to help any one our Christianity must first have helped and sustained us. It must be a deeper, holier, more satisfying thing in our own consciousness and experience. It must be to us and for us so consuming, saturating and over-mastering as to be better loved and better lived, before we either have or are able to preach unto others the gospel of hope, the gospel of help, and the gospel of peace. We cannot anticipate any spiritual advance which is unidentified with Jesus Christ and unsupported by His presence and grace. We despair of any permanent uplift and progress unless men gain this true inspiration and then grasp two fundamental principles: First, we are in the world with God and for God; second, that all true progress must include this from the start that Christianity must not be excluded from personal conduct, personal contact and moral fitness. Things social and moral gain their highest inspiration when founded on things spiritual. We have had too many programs with God and the soul left out.

"To Christians themselves there is a call to meet the test of these crucial days. Men are asking what is the matter with Christianity? The real inquiry should be, What is the matter with Christians? These are days when lukewarmness and indifference work grievous harm. Nothing is more disappointing than to preach what we only half believe, and only half live what we preach. The world is looking to Christians to find in life the promises of Jesus Christ. It is hungering for something to satisfy and sustain. Men are asking and want Christ interpreted to them in a life which illustrates His meaning, His love and His service. How deeply essential, therefore, those who interpret should bear the marks of the Lord Jesus Christ.

"Is it true that we have a Christianity today which is not contagious because it is not convincing to men? Is it a fact that Christian enthusiasm is on the wane and fails to attract men to God? Is it true that Christians themselves need a new conversion? And is this true, that our Christianity neither convinces nor converts others because of the small power it exerts over ourselves? No, these are not wholly true, but we should so fulfil our vocation and ministry that no man may be able to question what we mean by Christianity as it is reproduced in our own lives. To meet the clarion challenge of these days of stress and greed and doubt each must keep his skirts clean and his Christian ideals uplifted and unmodified. Bear in mind that a man is not rated nor worth what he possesses; he is worth only what he is in character, in influence, and in example, in his relations to and service for his fellowmen. It is one of the hopeful outlooks of the times that men are coming to see that a man's life does not belong to himself; it belongs to God and to humanity. This will further the realization that a man's religion does not end in what it does for him; it begins in what he can do for God and his fellow-creatures. Such a conception of Christianity lays something upon a man's conscience, upon his sympathy, and upon his service. It is not a question, 'Am I my brother's keeper'? This is the point, Am I my brother's helper?"

A resolution offered by the Bishop of Georgia and passed amid great enthusiasm expressed the devout hope that the Conference on the Reduction of Armament may carry on its labors in the solemn conviction of the uselessness and waste and demoralization of war, and with the deep recognition of the longing and desire of all just and righteous persons throughout the world for permanent peace among the nations. The clergy throughout the province are called upon in the resolution to call their people to public prayer on the days designated by the Presiding Bishop and Council, and a copy of the preamble and the resolution will be sent to the President of the United States.

Condemnation of the hideous principles underlying the Ku Klux Klan was made in a resolution offered by the Bishop of South Carolina, and the Bishop of Georgia offered a resolution, which was passed, that the Synod express its belief in the inter-racial commission. A commission of nine, was approved, one from each State within the province, to be known as the commission on race relationship, whose duty shall be to assist in the co-operation with the racial relationship commission in the formation of such joint committees in every community and in any other practical way to promote the cause of friendly relations between the white and colored people throughout the province.

The report of the Provincial Board of Christian Social Service, which was presented by the chairman, appears on page 13.

The report of the Provincial Board of Religious Education called for an increase in the appropriations, for the execution of a very fine program, and a resolution called for an appeal to the Department of Religious Education for more funds.

The Provincial Board of Missions provided addresses by the Rev. S. B. Stroup, Diocese of Asheville, on "The Mission to the Mountain People"; the Rev. L. N. Taylor, Diocese of North Carolina, on "The Mission to the Mill People"; the Rev. James M. Maxon, Diocese of Tennessee, on "The Rural Mission," and the Suffragan Bishop of North Carolina.

Notable among the addresses at the evening service was that of the Rev. Bernard Iddings Bell, of St. Stephen's College, Wednesday evening at Christ Church, who spoke on the University of the South, and gave one of the finest addresses on education ever listened to by members of the Church in the Fourth Province. Dr. Bell advocated the restoration of the English system of education in colleges condemning the tendency to specialize, and made a plea for better support of the educational institutions of the Church. The Bishop of Tennessee also spoke on the University of the South, and the closing evening at St. Paul's Church, he preached a missionary sermon.

The Synod and the Church Service League were the guests of the four parishes in Savannah, Christ Church, St. John's, St. Paul's and St. Michael and All Saints' Churches.

The invitation extended by the Rev. W. J. Loaring Clark to hold the 1923 Synod in St. Paul's Church, Chattanooga, Tenn., was accepted. The Bishop of Georgia was re-elected the provincial representative on the Presiding Bishop and Council, and Mr. T. H. Nickerson was re-elected Treasurer of the Province.

PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS.

We are glad to note from the resolution adopted by the Synod of the Province of Suwanee that their Social Service Department is moving along thoroughly helpful and practical lines.

We quote from the news report of the Synod as follows:

"The report of the Provincial Board of Christian Social Service presented by the chairman, the Bishop of South Carolina, called for six resolutions which were adopted as follows: that the Synod approve the plan of a field secretary for this department; recommending the abolition of the present fee system in connection with the feeding of prisoners in county jails; urging the clergy and members of social service committees to visit jails and convict camps to investigate conditions and seek by all lawful means to improve them; endorsing and approving the action of the Sewanee Training School for Workers in its efforts to establish in the province work among delinquent girls under the Church Mission of Help; recommending the appointment of a committee to confer with the American Church Institute for Negroes and the heads of the Church schools for negroes with a view to the establishment of a training school for negro deaconesses and social and parish workers; and an appeal to all Christian people to obey the law, the resolution expressing deep concern for the welfare of the country in the spread of mob violence and lawlessness. The report also dealt with the growing evil of divorce, the board lending its voice and moral support to those agencies now at work in the nation which aim at correcting this national evil, and recommendation was made that the members of the Synod study the motion picture problem with a view to educating public sentiment in the selection of the most elevating class of films, rather than advocating censorship."

BIBLE STUDY IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

In these days, when the Godlessness of the world is the common theme of many who shake their heads dismally, it is worth our while to look back to a little over one hundred years ago, when it was debated at William and Mary College whether or not Christianity had failed.

In contrast to such a condition, it is encouraging to know what some State universities are doing today to encourage Bible study.

The University of Virginia, following a plan started in North Dakota, is now offering regular high school credits to pupils who wish to take Bible courses.

We quote here the instructions to principals and pupils which have been sent out:

1. The Bible courses herein outlined are not intended to be made a part of the public school teaching, nor are public school funds to be used to provide this Bible teaching.

2. The responsibility for inducing pupils to elect these Bible courses must rest solely upon their parents and religious advisers.

3. The teaching may be done in Sunday schools, Sabbath schools, vacation Bible schools, Y. M. or Y. W. C. A. classes or in private schools or classes. Classes may meet once a week or oftener, but ninety recitation periods of forty minutes per period must be devoted to each course, and the class must be in charge of a teacher who will do and require faithful work.

4. Teachers and superintendents or directors of religious instruction are earnestly cautioned not to certify the fitness of pupils to take the examinations until such pupils have been thoroughly prepared and tested, lest failure to pass may discourage them and others from further Bible study.

5. Teachers are at liberty to supplement the courses as outlined with any tenets of their faith, or moral and spiritual applications that they desire, but examinations will deal only with the historical, geographical and literary matters outlined.

6. Religious bodies or individuals not caring to avail of this provision for Bible credit for their children are in no way required to do so, as pupils who do not apply for such credit will take some one of the regular high school electives in lieu of it.

7. References are indicated for the three versions of the English Bible in common use among Protestants, Catholics and Jews: The Authorized or King James, the Douay and the Leeser. Where only one reference is indicated there is no difference in the three versions. Where there is a difference the Authorized Version is in the text of the lessons; the Douay reference after it in parentheses; the Leeser Version in a footnote. In Course II, Douay references are also in footnotes.

8. The spelling of many proper names differs radically in the three versions used, but it has been impractical to indicate the differences. The Authorized Version has been followed. Teachers will have to aid pupils to find the equivalent name where other versions are used. With names, order of books, and the text of Biblical passages pupils must accurately follow whichever version they study.

II. To Pupils.

1. Hifh school pupils desiring credit for a course or courses in Bible study are permitted to substitute such courses for one or more of the regular electives.

2. They must take the course or courses under the instruction of a teacher, and preferably in an organized school of the religious body to which they or their parents belong.

3. In addition to regular attendance upon a class devoting ninety recitations of forty minutes' duration to each course, pupils must prepare their Bible lessons at home with the same thoroughness devoted to other studies.

4. Pupils intending to take an examination upon one of the Bible courses at the end of any school session must notify the principal one month before the examination period.

5. For admission to the examination, pupils must present to the principal the certificate found in this syllabus, duly filled out and signed.

6. Pupils passing the examination will be granted half a unit credit in Bible study. A maximum of one unit credit will be allowed upon the completion of two of the courses. Pupils may take examinations in all there courses and receive a certificate for passing them, but only one unit of high school credit will be allowed in lieu of regular elective courses.

III. To Principals.

1. Principals of high schools in which there are pupils preparing for Bible examinations should advise them as to what elective studies may best be omitted.

2. One month before the beginning of the final examinations of the session, principals should learn the number of pupils expecting to take Bible examinations, and which course, I, II or III, they are taking, and promptly order the necessary number of uniform examination questions from the Superintendent of Public Instruction, Richmond.

3. The examination in any Bible course must be given in the high school building at the same hour to all pupils in that course, regardless of the different hours for examination in the electives for which Bible study is substituted.

4. Principals need not grade Bible examination papers, but must send them all to the State Superintendent of Public Instruction, Richmond, to be graded by the committee. Papers of seniors whose graduation depends upon their success in the Bible examination must be graded by the principal with such aid from local religious leaders as he may desire. Such papers must later be forwarded to Richmond with all others.

5. At present only one examination will be held each term, and that will be at the end of the term, thus making two examinations each school session, if desired.

The three Dioceses in Virginia have organized a committee of one clergyman from each Diocese to co-operate in this work as follows: Rev. Carl Block, Roanoke, Va.; Rev. George P. Mayo, Richmond, Va., and Rev. H. H. Young, Kentridge, Va.

The latter, through co-operation of the Industrial Association of Lunenburg County, has induced sixty-one high school pupils to avail themselves of the credits secured by these Bible courses.

No doubt many other State universities have plans similar to this to encourage Bible study, and if they have not, by a little pressure from Church people, they could be induced to adopt them.

There is a great opportunity here for those of us who wish to see a greater knowledge of the Holy Scriptures to bring this plan to the attention of school principals, and to encourage pupils to take these courses in the State of Virginia, and to find out what is being done along these lines in other States.

Church Intelligence

Letter from the Presiding Bishop to His Diocese.

Dear Brethren:

Friday, November 11, will be the third anniversary of Armistice Day, when the horrible carnage of the great world war was stopped.

The President of the United States has called a general conference of representatives of the nations to meet in Washington on that day to endeavor to devise and act upon some plan for the reduction or limitation of the dreadful armaments which project the horrors of war upon the vision of the people of the earth, and which choke out their very life in the grip of a burthening taxation.

It is a time of crisis. It is a day to mark an epoch. Christian love and patriotic duty call upon us to mind it. I call upon you to give it thought and counsel, prayer and supplication.

You are asked to meet for a civic and religious service in Christ Church Cathedral, Thirteenth and Locust Streets, at 11 o'clock on that day, Friday, November 11, for thanksgiving to God for the armistice, and entreaty to God for His guidance and blessing upon the beneficent aim of the conference.

I beg all the clergy to come, and to be vested, and in the chancel; I beg them to ask their congregations to come; I beg the citizens of St. Louis generally to come.

The service will not be long. Bishop Tuttle will preach. There will be no collection.

We will humbly prostrate ourselves before Him who is the Lord of hosts, and the God of righteousness, justice, liberty and peace. We will beseech Him to take the cause into His own hand, and to tell us whither we are to go, and what we are to do, that righteousness and justice and peace for the nations of the earth may flow down in a mighty stream as the rivers run into the sea.

God, mercifully have us in His holy keeping, and help us, and save us, for His dear Son's sake, our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen.

DANIEL S. TUTTLE,
Bishop of Missouri.

St. Louis, Mo., Oct. 25, 1921.

General Theological Seminary.

The official ballot for trustees of the General Theological Seminary, to be elected by the alumni, and bearing the following nominations, have been distributed:

The terms of the following trustees elected (by the alumni) expire at the close of the civil year, viz., the Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, D. D., the Rev. John Keller and Mr. Robert L. Gerry.

Polls are now open; they will close at the Seminary on Thursday, December 15, 1921. Every alumnus is urged to participate in this election.

By the kind invitation of the dean, and with the cordial co-operation of the faculty, the program of events for the mid-winter reunion and dinner of the alumni will cover the morning, afternoon and evening of Tuesday, January 17, 1922.

VIRGINIA.

Rt Rev W. C. Brown, D D., Bishop.

Annual Meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary, Richmond.

The thirty-first annual convention of the Woman's Auxiliary in the Diocese of Virginia was held November 2-3 at Monumental Church, Richmond. The meeting was opened with a celebration of the Holy Communion by Bishop Brown, assisted by the rector of the church, the Rev. George P. Mayo. Many prominent delegates and visitors were present, including a number of workers among the mountaineers and missionaries from the foreign fields.

Miss Louisa T. Davis presided at the meeting, and the business sessions were devoted principally to reports of the work accomplished by the Auxiliary in the last year. These reports were most encouraging, for in spite of many obstacles the work accomplished shows wonderful progress.

During the year eight new branches of the Woman's Auxiliary were formed and three of Section B. There are still a few counties without branches, and it is hoped that these will soon become organized.

The treasurer reported that the contribution in the past year was the largest that has ever been received, being a little over eleven thousand dollars, and urged them to do greater things.

The educational department has doubled their efforts to establish Mission Study classes and distribute more literature, and the churches were urged to send delegates to the different mission conferences so that the parish classes may be a success.

The work of the Junior Auxiliary, Section B, and the Little Helpers was reported, each showing a steady growth in the work accomplished and in interest.

From the diocesan missionaries valuable information about the work in the mountains of Virginia was received. It is very gratifying to learn that in spite of many difficulties each year more missions are established and the natives educated to carry on the work and assist in establishing the new missions.

The Rev. Lloyd R. Craighill, in his address, "An Opportunity in China," emphasized the point that China would become westernized and a great responsibility rested with the Church to take to them a knowledge of Christ so that they would develop into a Christian nation. Mrs. Lloyd Craighill urged the Auxiliary to "help open the gates of Nanchang." The Rev. Mr. Ramsaur spoke on his work in Liberia and the wonderful possibilities of the Church there.

One of the greatest pleasures of this convention was the presence of Miss Grace Lindley, who gave an address on "The Jubilee of the Woman's Auxiliary."

The Rev. E. L. Woodward, M. D., dean of the Church schools in the Diocese, told of the great work which had been accomplished by the Church schools, and urged the Auxiliary to link up the individual parishes with the schools so that they would establish scholarships.

Bishop Brown, in his address, spoke of the great blessings which had resulted from the Nation-Wide Campaign, and the great benefits derived from the Bishop's Emergency Fund.

Two resolutions were adopted at this convention—one to be sent to the President, commending him for calling a conference for the consideration of a reduction of armament; and another to the Synod, opposing the formation of any society that threatens the existence of the Woman's Auxiliary or to absorb its work.

Several changes were made in the Constitution, the most important being that of changing the annual meeting from November to May. Officers were elected and an invitation was accepted to hold the next meeting in Winchester the first Wednesday in May.

The closing feature of the convention was a religious pageant, "The Missions of the Church."

Any one attending this convention could not help but be impressed with the tremendous amount of work accomplished in such a short time. Little time was given to social features. An informal reception at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Mayo preceded the convention, and a reception by Mrs. Davis at the Governor's Mansion on the last day. To this may be added the luncheon hour, when the women of Monumental Church served the delegates and visitors so bountifully and gave them an opportunity to know each other better.

L. L. W.

The members of Ware Church, in Gloucester County, joined with the people at Abingdon and gave the pageant issued by the Nation-Wide Campaign Department of the Church on Sunday, October 30.

The parts were exceedingly well taken, and it made a sacred and inspiring service of praise and thanksgiving for the achievements of the Church in the missionary fields for the past hundred years.

Beautiful old Abingdon Church was packed from the front door to the galleries with people who came from miles around.

A mass meeting was held in the Richmond City Auditorium on the afternoon of November 6, under the auspices of the Ministerial Union, to arouse interest of Christian people in the Conference for the Limitation of Armaments. Hon. A. J. Montague, representative for the Richmond District in Congress, was the speaker, and many signed a memorial to the President urging action of a definite nature at the conference.

The Richmond Convocation met in Christ Church, Richmond, on October 25 and 26. The attendance was small, but the sessions were exceedingly interesting. Rev. Edwin R. Carter, of Hampton, Va., spoke on Tuesday night on Religious Education. On Wednesday night the Rev. Percy Hall, of Alexandria, and Rev. G. M. Brydon made encouraging and helpful addresses on the Nation-Wide Campaign.

A farewell party was given by the vestries and Woman's Auxiliaries of Emmanuel Church, Greenwood, and St. George's Chapel, Crozet, at Emmanuel Parish House to the Rev. D. Campbell Mayers and Mrs. Mayers on Friday, October 28, when a purse containing a generous gift in gold was presented by the two branches of the Auxiliary to the rector as a token of their appreciation of his ministry during the past six and a half years. Mr. Mayers assumes charge of John's Parish, in Loudoun County, on November 15, with residence at Middleburg.

Bishop Brown visited Trinity Church, Manassas, on Sunday, November 6, and confirmed a class of twenty. Work is progressing rapidly on the new church here.

The new St. Anne's Church, Nokesville, to replace the one which was burned to the ground last February, is now under roof, and will soon be ready for use. Bishop Brown visited this church on Sunday afternoon, November 6, and confirmed a class of four.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Celebration of the Tenth Anniversary of the Bishops of the Diocese: Other Important Anniversaries Observed.

Impressive ceremonies marking the tenth anniversary of the consecration of Bishop Rhinelander and Bishop Suffragan Garland were held in the Church of the Advocate. The celebration also gave a fresh impetus to the movement for a cathedral, all the speakers touching on that feature, Bishop Rhinelander himself making a strong plea for it, and the Rev. Dr. Alexander Mann, of Boston, also advocated the founding of the new cathedral in an address entitled "The Relation of a Cathedral to the Parishes of the Diocese."

A feature of the celebration was the presentation to Bishop Rhinelander of a pastoral staff by members of the Cathedral Chapter. Eli Kirk Price made the presentation before the service.

A choir composed of clergymen led the processional, and Colonel William P. Barba was the organist.

The celebration of the Holy Communion was conducted by Bishop Rhinelander, and the Rev. J. DeWolf Perry, D. D., president of the Standing Committee, delivered an address in which he congratulated the bishops on their successful administration of the affairs of the Diocese.

In observance of the seventy-fifth anniversary of Calvary Church, Philadelphia, a series of special services were held, beginning with an All Saints' Day service, conducted by the rector, the Rev. Charles L. Steel, and at the evening service the Rev. Dr. L. C. Washburn preached. A reception was held on Wednesday night and a dinner given to the members on Thursday.

Calvary Church held its first service in 1846 in a sail loft at Front and Noble Streets. A church was erected at Front, and Margaretta Streets in 1851 as a memorial to Bishop White, and the building was consecrated during the General Convention of 1856, all the House of Bishops attending in respect to Bishop White.

In 1882 Calvary Church was taken down, stone by stone, and rebuilt in its present location.

The Rev. James C. Crossan began his rectorship of the Church of St. Jude and the Nativity, Philadelphia, and the services also marked the seventy-seventh anniversary of the founding of the church. Mr. Crossan was introduced to the congregation at the morning service by the Rev. George S. Gassner, D. D., who has been in charge of the parish since the removal of the Rev. L. N. Caley, D. D., to St. Martin's Church, Oak Lane. The new rector preached his initial sermon, taking for the subject, "The Spirit of Progress."

A reception was given the rector on Wednesday evening.

In observance of the thirty-second anniversary of the consecration of Grace Church, Mount Airy, a series of special services were held, beginning with an All Saints' Day service, conducted by the rector, Rev. Thomas S. Cline. The holding of the regular "annual family dinner" took place Wednesday evening. The Woman's Auxiliary and Guild held an all day meeting on Thursday, and the service on Sunday, November 6, commemorated the one hundredth anniversary of the Church Missionary Society. During the afternoon the parish united in a centennial pageant at the Church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, Chestnut Hill.

St. Martha's House, Philadelphia, on November 3 celebrated its twentieth anniversary, and also the twentieth anniversary of Deaconess Colesberry, who has had it in charge since its organization. Hundreds of the youngsters of the settlement, most of them foreigners, joined in the celebration.

At the close of his address Bishop Rhinelander presented Deaconess Colesberry with a gold watch, the gift of the board of the settlement, together with a $100 Liberty Bond. The deaconess also received a number of gifts and flowers from the women in the settlement.

St. Martha's House aids the thousands of children in the down-town section. It has thirteen boys' clubs and nine girls' clubs, besides classes for the grown-ups and a kindergarten for the children.

Social Service: Under the auspices of the Diocesan Social Service Department, the Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, Executive Secretary of the National Department of Social Service of the Church, is delivering a series of addresses on "The Social Opportunity of the Churchman," on Tuesday and Thursday evenings in November in the Church House.

Bequests of $1,000 each to the Sheltering Arms, of the Episcopal Church, the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, the House of Rest, Germantown, and the Home for Incurables, were made by Juliet K. Wood, who died October 13.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Organization of the National Organ School.

The announcement of the National Organ School, Washington, D. C., recently organized, will be received with distinct pleasure and satisfaction by all who are particularly interested in Church music of the highest order. The school will have for its purpose the training of students in all branches of music necessary for the profession of Church and concert organist, and is founded upon principles similar to those used in the leading English and French musical colleges and cathedrals. Mr. Edgar Priest, organist of the Washington Cathedral, is director of the school, with a faculty of six. Mr. Priest was formerly assistant organist of Manchester Cathedral, England, and is a graduate of the Royal College of Music, Manchester, Eng. Every member of the faculty brings to the work of the school splendid equipment and experience in his line. Unusual opportunity for organ practice will be afforded students of the school, and the privilege of such a course in Washington, with its many attractions, will be found well worth while. Canon J. W. Austin, rector of All Saints' Church, Chevy Chase, is one of the faculty, having for his subject, "Hymnology and Musical History." Other subjects of the Organ and Choir Training Course are Organ, Choir Training, Harmony, Musical Dictation, Improvisation, Score Reading, Keyboard Harmony and Organ Construction.

For the Coming Conference: A series of meetings was held during the week of November 7 at Epiphany Church in connection with the Conference on Limitation of Armaments. They were under the direction of Dr. Freeman, rector of Epiphany Church, and were held from 12:05 to 12:30. The speakers were not limited to clergy of the Episcopal Church, but included the Rev. Charles Wood, of the Church of the Covenant, Presbyterian; Bishop William F. McDowell, of the Methodist Church, and Senator J. Selden Spencer. Similar meetings will be held during the week of November 14, one of the speakers being the Hon. William Jennings Bryan.

Grace Church, S. W., has achieved a goal for which every member, with the rector, has worked diligently for the last few years. A heavy debt has been entirely wiped out and a special service was recently held when the mortgage was burned as a practical demonstration of the success of this undertaking. The congregation is not large, and they and their rector, the Rev. Meade Bolton MacBryde, are to be most heartily congratulated.

Collect for Twenty-fifth Sunday After Trinity.

O Lord, we beseech Thee, absolve Thy people from their offenses; that through Thy bountiful goodness we may all be delivered from the bands of those sins, which by our frailty we have committed. Grant this, O heavenly Father, for Jesus Christ's sake, our blessed Lord and Saviour. Amen.

Kinsman-Redeemer.

I like to think of Him when at twilight the tide lies low,
And the boats slip out from the beach with measured oar and slow;
I like to think how He walked on the shores of Galilee;
And saw with the eyes of the Christ the common things we see.

I like to think of Him, too, when the sunrise colors spread
Over a world that seemed sleeping, and still, and dead;
How at Gennesaret they flashed over His brave, wan Face;
Taking the dark night out; putting God in its place.

I like to think of the Lord as I walk each walk of life;
How His eyes looked straight at God, how His hands cured pain and strife;
I like to remember His love when the night is cool and still;
Brother and Friend and King, deed of a perfect Will!

Loaves and Fishes.

Rev. Louis Tucker.

News of John Baptist's death ran like a thunder-clap through the oasis. It smote the apostles into silence, each pair where it found them, and sent them to the Master. He was in Capernaum, for they "took boat" with him, and the boat was there.

The whole country was astir. The throngs which followed each apostle converged on Capernaum, packing the little city so that there was no time for anything except to heal them, not even to eat. Yet there was needed a quiet, personal interview with each apostle, in which he could tell the Master what he had done; the first fruits of Christian service and, to the mystic, the symbol of that quiet interview with the Master which each servant shall have when he goes home. It was also necessary to keep the crowd from that insurrection for which John's death had made them ripe. Also, it was necessary to remove himself and the apostles from danger of that invitation to Herod's court, which was the practical equivalent of arrest. He sailed to the nearest vacant pasture-land outside Herod's territory.

The place was east of Jordan, the nearest town was Julias, or Bethsaida; not Bethsaida of Galilee, but another, named for Caesar's daughter Julia. John says it was just before Passover, and Mark casually mentions that the grass was green—a significant statement in a country where the grass dries to hay on the stalk when the spring rains are spent.

The crowds at Capernaum heard where they were going, or guessed by watching the boat, for they set out along the shore, crossed Jordan at a ford, and got there, some of them, before the boat did. The grassy down where they met Him is on the shore of the lake about a mile from Jordan and two from Bethsaida Julias. People kept streaming in, and many among the multitude were women and children. The common people had no leader and, "like sheep without a shepherd," as He put it, they turned to Him.

He cured "them that had need of healing." Then He went a little way up a hill, gathered them below Him, and taught them "many things," speaking of the kingdom of God. He seems to have spoken plainly, without parables. The malignant Committee of Observation, the Scribes and Pharisees for whom He spoke in parables that seeing they might not see and hearing they might not understand, seem left behind. As they were eminent men, elderly, unfitted to race along the shore and ford rivers, the inference is warranted. You cannot pervert a parable; but since they were not there to pervert His sayings He could speak plainly and at length.

The poor apostles were tired. Also, they had gained experience in handling crowds and had definite ideas as to how it ought to be done. At last they mustered courage to interrupt Him, saying:

"This is a country place, and it is now very late. Send the multitude away, that they may go into the towns and villages and get shelter and buy food."

"Feed them yourselves," He said, and went on with His speech.

It was a crushing retort—and expressive. They consulted with each other and with Judas, the treasurer, and found what money the whole party had. It came to about two hundred dollars. Then they interrupted again, asking for definite orders, saying:

"Shall we go and buy two hundred dollars worth of bread and give it to them to eat?"

"How many loaves have you? Go and see," He said, and went on with His speech.

Now this concerned the mate of the boat. The situation is homely and human. Somebody had put lunch in the boat-lockers, and the Master knew it. Andrew, the mate, called the ship's boy and sent him back to the beach to find out. The customs of fishing-boats are unchangeable, because founded on the primal necessities of human nature. There was a boat, there was a boy, there was a captain and a mate, and somebody was in the habit of putting lunch on board. Any one familiar with fishermen's customs knows this without being told, just as he knows that salt-water fishermen carry large water-casks and fresh-water fishermen carry comparatively small casks, and why; and also why fresh-water fishermen carry any at all. It is not possible here to discuss how much the phrases that tell of the primacy of Peter in the apostolic college depend on the fact that he was skipper of the boat, and therefore, by world-old custom, spokesman for the crew ashore as well as afloat.

While the boy was gone the Master ended His speech. What thunder of oratory, what magnificence of peroration was lost to the world because the twelve were too troubled about supper to record them, we can only guess. Then He turned to Philip. He was teaching the twelve a great lesson of faith. He did not allow preventable emergencies to rise without having in mind a way to meet them. 'He Himself knew what He would do." That lesson must stay taught. The situation, therefore, had all the elements of humor. We intend no irreverence in saying that they did not come by chance. We think the Master perceived, enjoyed and took the necessary steps to use them. If there were no trouble in His eye as He turned to Philip we are much mistaken.

"Philip, where shall we buy bread that these may eat?"

Philip was familiar with Bethsaida Julias, the nearest town, and could reasonably be supposed to know the bake-shops there. He did not answer the question, probably because puzzled at what was coming next. He said instead:

"Two hundred dollars worth of bread is not enough for them that every one of them may have a little."

By this time the boy had come back, and Andrew looked over what he brought and reported:

"Here is a lad who has five barley loaves and two small fishes; but what are they among so many?"

Some one else, probably Peter as skipper, added:

"We have no more unless we go and buy food for all these people."

"Bring them here to Me. Make the men sit down by fifties in a company."

The twelve scattered through the crowd and made them all sit down by hundreds and by fifties, in ranks. The word may mean garden-beds. There proved to be about five thousand men, besides women and children, and the companies on the grass, in their bright, many-colored garments, looked like flower-beds. Then He took the five loaves and the two fishes and, looking up to heaven, He blessed and broke and gave them to His disciples, and the disciples to those who were set down, as much as they would. The blessing, which it was a religious obligation to use at every meal, runs:

"Blessed art Thou, Jehovah our God, King of the World, Who causeth bread to come forth from the earth."

They all ate and had enough; and when they were filled He said:

"Gather up the fragments which remain, that nothing be lost." The reference is to the undistributed portions which remained by Him.

They gathered them together and filled twelve basket-work haversacks. These they always carried with them, slung from the belt. Travelers used them instead of valises. Each took his haversack full.

Everything passed off so quietly that it was not until the crowd saw the twelve filling their haversacks that they realized what had happened. Then the meaning of it all burst upon them and they shouted, "This is, of a truth, that prophet which should come into the world," and with the shout went mad. Apostles and all, apostles first of all, they would have taken Him by force and made Him king.

Then He took command. Short, sharp, authoritative, His orders must have been, for it is written of this time only in all His ministry that He constrained them. He constrained them to get into the boat and sent them home. Then He dismissed the multitude. There is but one way. He must have let them see He wished to pray. Then He turned and walked through the gathering dusk into the barren hills alone. And no man dared to follow Him, because He went to talk with God.

Not Far Away!

Lincoln C. Cummings.

Our dear one is not far away,
We feel his nearness every day.

God found him ready! At his post.
His last thought, those he loved the most.

Such love as his can never change,
Grows stronger, purer, with more range;

And deeper insight to our needs.
Its constant power, our longing heeds.

His influence still around we feel,
Go cheer and lead, to warn and heal.

So we rejoice each night and day,
Our dear one is not far away!

An Alphabetical Retort.

After several complaints had been made to him, the vicar of a certain church, says the Sketch, came to an opinion that his old sexton was neglecting certain duties.

The sexton, who was not wanting in wit, strenuously denied the charge, and said that he was "not goin' to stand no meddlin' with his affairs."

"But, John," argued the vicar, "it behooves everybody to mind his 'p's' and 'q's.'"

"Everybody except me," retorted the old man, refusing to be cornered. "I've enough to do to mind my keys and pews."—Youth's Companion.

Common Phrases.

"Eating humble pie" is a phrase which really arose from the corruption of the word "umbles" or "numbles," the coarser parts of a deer killed in hunting, which when made into a pie were formerly reserved for the servants. "Cooking his goose" is a phrase which originated when a king of Sweden, on approaching a hostile town, excited the contempt of the inhabitants by the smallness of his army. To express this they hung out a goose for him to shoot at, whereupon the king set fire to the town to "cook the goose."

Long ago unscrupulous people used to take a cat in a bag to market, where they tried to sell it for a pig. If, however, a purchaser opened the bag before buying, the cat, of course, jumped out, displaying the fraud. Hence the term, "letting the cat out of the bag," also the common reference to "buying a pig in a poke."

It is a curious fact that the phrase, "Bald as a badger," owes its origin to authors of the past who had no exact knowledge of natural history, and who, because the forehead of a badger is covered with smooth white hairs, came to the conclusion that it was bald.

Years ago a theatrical manager had in his company an actor whose strong point was the ghost in "Hamlet." If his salary was not forthcoming on Saturday, this actor would exclaim, "Then the ghost won't walk tonight," a phrase which is still used by actors on pay day, and which provides a striking illustration of how a casual remark becomes a common saying.—Selected.

The Conquering Tide.

On the far reef the breakers
Recoil in scattered foam,
Yet still the sea behind them
Urges its forces home.

Its chant of triumph surges
Through all the thunderous din—
The wave may break in failure,
But the tide is sure to win.

The reef is strong and cruel;
Upon its jagged wall,
One wave—a score—a hundred,
Broken and beaten fall.

Yet in defeat they conquer,
The sea comes flooding in—
Wave upon wave is routed,
But the tide is sure to win.

O mighty sea, thy message
In clanging spray is cast;
Within God's plan of progress
It matters not at last

How wide the shores of evil,
How strong the reefs of sin—
The wave may be defeated,
But the tide is sure to win.

—Presbyterian Witness.

A Great Social Fact.

It is one of the outstanding wonders of Christian fellowship to say that if we tell our griefs we lose them, and if we communicate our joys we multiply them. In the one case we lose, and in the other we gain. Better still, we lose the very thing we do not want to keep, and gain that which our souls most deeply desire to have. Blessed philosophy is that which empties our hearts of sorrow and fills them full of joy—"good measure, pressed down, shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom." Let the fellowships of life, especially in the home, the social circle, and in the sanctuary, be frank and sincere, and that will make them pure and sweet.—Religious Telescope.

The Grace of Forgiveness.

Forgiveness is a reconciling experience. Forgiveness, although a word in common use, is really a word difficult to understand. We think of it most clearly if we think of it as a reconciliation between two who have been estranged, by the grace of that one of them who has been wronged. When we are forgiven of God He is reconciled to us. He has remitted our sin. A master, to quote a case within my knowledge, detected a lad, just beginning life, in an act of fraud. He called him in, and inquired into his temptation. He ascertained who had led him into the forgery. He spoke of his breach of trust with words which were tense with anger, but also tender with grief. He paid up the amount of forgery, and forgave him. He sent the lad back to his desk, and he kept his secret. It was the youth himself, many years later, grown to manhood, who revealed it with an adoring reverence, and recalled, with grateful recollection of a man who had been saved, the forgiveness of his sin. That is God's way of dealing with sin, and its issue is always reconciliation.

Going Slow.

The two men were adrift in an open boat and it looked bad for them. Finally one of them, frightened, began to pray.

"O Lord," he prayed; "I've broken most of Thy commandments. I've been a hard drinker, but if my life is spared now I'll promise Thee never again—"

"Wait a minute, Jack," said his friend. "Don't go too far. I think I see a sail."

Your Place.

Is your place a small place?
Tend it with care!
He set you there.

Is your place a small place?
Guard it with care!
He set you there.

Whate'er your place, it is
Not your's alone, but His
Who set you there.

—John Oxenham.

The gospel of St. John will ever be the solace and joy of the Christian in his loftiest and lowliest moods. He will always feel the truthfulness of the language in which the child-like Claudius describes his emotions while perusing this gospel: "I have from my youth up delighted to read the Bible, but especially the gospel of St. John. There is something in it exceedingly wonderful; twilight and night, and through them the quick flash of lightning; soft evening clouds, and behind the clouds, the full-orbed moon. There is something also so high and mysterious and solemn that one cannot become weary. It seems to me in reading the gospel of St. John, as if I saw him at the last supper, leaning upon the breast of his Master, and as if an angel were holding my lamp, and at certain passages wished to whisper something in my ear. I am far from understanding all that I read; yet it seems as if the meaning were hovering in the distance before my mind's eye. And even when I look into an entirely dark passage, I have an intimation of a great and glorious meaning within it which I shall some day understand.—W. G. T. Shedd.

Experience bows a sweet contented face,
Still setting—to her seal that God is true;
Beneath the sun, she knows, is nothing new;
All things that go return with measured pace,
Winds, rivers, man's still recommencing race—
While Hope beyond earth's circle strains her view,
Past sun and moon, and rain and rainbow, too,
Enamored of unseen eternal grace.
Experience saith, "My God doeth all things well":
And for the morrow taketh little care,
Such peace and patience garrison her soul—
While Hope, who never yet hath eyed the goal,
With arms flung forth, and backward-floating hair,
Touches, embraces, hugs the invisible.

Slumber Song.

Anna B. Bensel.

Close your eyes, Laddie, the soft dew is falling,
Each bird is asleep in its warm little nest.
Close your eyes, Laddie, the night wind is singing
A slumber-song low that shall lull you to rest.

High overhead is the baby-moon peeping
Out from its wavering curtains of blue:
The crickets are chirping; the daisy is nodding
Under its cap of the snowiest hue.

Close your eyes, Laddie; all hail now for Dreamland!
Lightly your cradle-boat rocketh away.
Angels of children, from heaven down-bending,
Watch o'er your slumbers till break of the day.

Sammie.

Mother and daddy and Billy Boy had gone to California for the winter, so Betty Lou had come to grandfather's farm for a long visit.

One morning she was standing on the back porch, looking off over the fields, when down in the south meadow she saw some little white objects frisking about in the sun.

"Grandfather," she cried, "do come and see what these funny little white things are down in the meadow."

Grandfather came out on the porch, put on what Betty Lou called his long-distance glasses, and looked down in the meadow.

"Why, those are my lambs," he laughed. "Thirty-nine of the finest merinos in the county. Want to go down tonight and help me salt them?"

"I'd love to," cried Betty Lou.

"All right; be ready about 5 o'clock."

Such a bleating as there was as they came to the meadow, and the little creatures came crowding up to the fence.

"Aren't they dear?" exclaimed Betty Lou; "so soft and woolly. O grandfather! look at that little fellow over there. Isn't he cunning?"

"He does seem friendly," said grandfather. "Here, see if he'll eat the salt out of your hand."

"Oh, he does, he does!" cried Betty Lou. "May I have him for my very own?"

"Remember, he won't be a lamb always," grandfather warned her.

"When he gets to be a big sheep I'll give him back," promised Betty You. "What shall I call him, grandfather?"

"Let me see," said grandfather, looking very wise.

"I know," cried Betty Lou; "I'll call him Sammie. Then every one will know he's an American."

"All right; Sammie it is," agreed grandfather. "I suppose you'll have to mark him to tell him from the others?"

"Yes, with red, white and blue ribbon around his neck."

Sammie was petted and coaxed and made a regular little playfellow, but at night he always went back to his companions, where, huddled close together in the sheepfold, they all kept nice and warm.

At Christmas time Sammie had a beautiful new ribbon and a little bell with a clear, musical tinkle.

And then came a big blizzard. It began New Year's Eve, and was so terrible that no one would venture outdoors. When Betty Lou looked out in the morning it seemed like a different world. A great white blanket was over everything, and no sign of lambs.

"O, I wonder where Sammie is!" thought Betty Lou.

Just then she saw grandfather with Jim and Ben, the hired men, coming from the barn through what looked like a deep trench, with the snow piled on either side.

Betty Lou ran out on the porch.

"Grandfather," she called, "where are the lambs?"

"That's just what we're going to find out," answered grandfather, as they went into the tool-house.

They came out with shovels and pitchforks, and started off down the trench again. Betty Lou watched them as they climbed out of the trench and waded across the fields in the deep snow.

Pretty soon she saw them coming back, each holding a funny looking bundle which they carried into the summer kitchen.

"Grandmother," she called, "do you s'pose they've found the lambs?"

"Yes, dear; the blizzard came on so suddenly the little things couldn't find their way back to the sheepfold, and were all buried in the snow, which really kept them warm. So grandfather has built a big fire in the summer kitchen and hopes he can save them."

The men, with some of the neighbors, kept bringing in the little white bundles, until grandfather counted thirty-eight, but Sammie was not among them.

"Do let me go and look for him," begged Betty Lou. "I know all the nice, sunny places where he loves to lie. I'm sure I can find him."

But grandfather said no. It was hard enough for the men to wade through the deep snow. It was getting late and the men were all tired.

Betty Lou could hardly keep from crying, but she knew crying would do no good. Then kind-hearted Ben said, "You bundle her up good and warm, Mrs. Mason, and I'll carry her. It won't hurt her a bit, and maybe she can find Sammie."

So grandmother put on Betty Lou's sweater and coat and leggings and cap. Ben swung her up on his broad shoulders, and they started off. Grandmother could see the red cap bobbing up and down as they went along the trench, then out in the fields. They went around the sheepfold, and Ben poked and peeked into every nook and corner where he thought Sammie might be.

Just as he said, "I'm afraid we'll have to give it up, Betty Lou," Betty Lou gave a little scream, for peeping through a little crack in the snow was the end of a red, white and blue ribbon. As Ben carefully lifted the snowy bundle, Sammie's bell gave out its musical tinkle.

So Betty Lou, with a loving pat now and then for the precious bundle under Ben's arm, rode proudly home, where Sammie was finally thawed out, and soon was bleating loudly for something to eat.—Marie Schilling, in Mayflower.

The Woodpile.

"These apples are pretty good, but they don't come up to the ones Tim gave us the other day, do they?" declared Albert, taking a generous bite out of one.

"No," replied Ethel, "and I wish Tim would come back and tell us some more stories."

"I wish so, too!" chimed in little Margaret.

"Well, he can't, for nearly two weeks," Albert explained. "I went to see him yesterday, and I think he pretty nearly chopped his foot off; anyhow, he has to keep it propped up on a chair and he feels terribly because he can't work. He says the dollar and a half a day he was getting to clean up this woodpile meant a good deal to him. He is whittling me a boat."

"I don't see why grandfather won't pay him just the same," said Ethel, as she helped herself to another apple from her brother's hat."

"Course he won't do that; we don't pay people for not working," Albert replied in a very manly tone. "But I tell you what," he added suddenly as a happy thought flashed into his mind. He threw his apple core at a passing chicken before he repeated this "I tell you what, if we are sorry for Tim, why can't we earn his money for him?"

"But we can't split or saw wood."

"Of course we can't, but we don't have to. Tim has it nearly all cut, and he told me that if he only had the rest of it in the house he could manage to split it up, even if he did have his foot propped up. So we might load it onto my cart and I will draw it over to his house and back, and then you girls can pile it all up back of the kitchen each time I bring a load home."

"Oh, that will be fine! Let's begin right now, and we will ask grandfather to pay Tim just the same, won't we?" exclaimed Ethel.

All three children scrambled down from the woodpile and began their work right away; even little Margaret could carry two sticks at a time, and she trotted back and forth like a busy little ant. It was not all play, for slivers would get into their hands, and at times it would have been much pleasanter to play in the orchard, but they gladly kept at their task, and felt amply rewarded by Tim's gratitude. They looked forward to the day when he would return and see all the neatly corded wood they were keeping as a surprise for him.

"I don't know but that this is better fun than just sitting around, not knowing what to do with ourselves," was Albert's comment toward the end of their work, and both sisters agreed with a "I think so, too!"—The Sunbeam.

Trying to Oblige.

Mother was teaching five-year-old Bobby geography. She had come to the Sahara Desert. "Now, say it—Sahara," she prompted him.

"Hara," replied Bobby.

"No, not Hara—Sahara, don't you see?" said mother patiently. "Now, say it."

Again Bobby replied, "Hara."

That kept up for some time uhtil finally Bobby, worn out, exclaimed indignantly, "Well, mother, didn't I say Hara?"—Youth's Companion.

The Thistle Elf.

As I was walking by myself,
I saw a very little elf;
He tried to make himself so small
That he could not be seen at all.

But I had seen him hide away
Behind a pebble where it lay,
And so I caught him in my hand,
And there the poor thing had to stand.

But as I tried to ask if he Could grant me wishes one, two, three,
He flew away, the naughty chap!
But left the tassel from his cap!

My mother says it's thistle seed;
Of course, she's very wrong indeed,
For I know what it is, myself,
And keep it caref'ly on a shelf.
—Edith Price, in St. Nicholas.

The Team.

The ocean was green as an emerald, the sand was yellow and shining, and the sky was clear blue with little flecks of fleecy cloud in it; but Arthur was not happy. He was spending a day at the seashore, and he had no boat to play with.

"I wish I had saved up my money and bought one," he mourned.

But he had not dreamed of a trip to the shore, and now it was too late.

"I brought your train of cars along," his mother said.

Arthur said, "Thank you," rather sadly. "But I don't see what I can do with a train of cars on the beach," he added.

However, he tucked the little train under his arm and ran down to the shore; there he sat down rather forlornly and looked at the wateer. "I want a boat," he said aloud.

Then he jumped up, for a small voice just behind him said suddenly, "I have one."

He turned and saw a very little girl in a very large hat who was carrying a two-masted sailboat almost as large as herself.

"Whew!" said Arthur, scrambling to his feet. "That is a beauty." He gazed at it eagerly.

"So is that train," said the little girl. "It's got six cars, hasn't it?"

"Yes," answered Arthur, "but what good is a train at the seashore? What is your name?"

"Eunice," said the little girl. "Once," she added, "when I was at my uncle's, I saw a train run right up to the edge of the ocean."

"What for?" Arthur asked doubtfully.

"It was full of stones," Eunice went on, "and it backed down a wharf and under a kind of covered shed. Then boats came up to the wharf and carried off the stones."

Arthur's face shone. "I see a lot of boards over there," he said. "Why can't we build a wharf?"

"And haul pebbles and shells," said Eunice. "That will be great fun."

It was. They made a little embankment of sand and on it built a fine wharf of the pieces of some old wooden boxes. Then the Sea Gull, which was the name of Eunice's boat, came sailing down the coast and tied up at the wharf. Captain Eunice ordered "all hands out!" The "hands" were several small dolls in sailor costume. Conductor Arthur's train came in with a rush and a roar, every car filled with pebbles and shells, and in little or no time the vessel was loaded. Then it sailed away to a point down the coast, discharged its load and returned for more.

By the time the supper bell rang on the cliff above the two friends, with the aid of the Sea Gull and the Comet —as Eunice named Arthur's train— had hauled a pile of pebbles and shells almost big enough to fill a bushel basket.

"I shall have plenty of shells to carry home with me," said Arthur, "but I wish I didn't have to go."

"You must come back," said Eunice politely. "And be sure to bring the Comet."

"They make a fine team, don't they?" Arthur said. "Of course I'm coming back!"—Isabel Jamison in Youth's Companion.

A Flower of the Crusades.

"Oh, that I might see home and mother," sighed the lad Tito as he sat in tattered garments resting beside the highway. On his head he wore a pointed cap, and there were glimpses of red and blue in his coat; but they were faded now, for months ago he had gone to the great city of Damascus with a large party of people on foot and on horseback, to help them in a great battle against the Saracens.

Tito was a soldier of the Roman people, and he had left his mother to fight for the ownership of a deep well of pure water where the Christ had once stopped to drink. It was many days afterwards when Tito and the other soldiers reached again the city of Rome.

When Tito reached the Street of the Birdcage, where his mother lived, he put his hand quickly to his belt and there he felt a small package, the only present he had been able to bring home from the Far East.

"These seeds grew by the roadside and I tucked them in my girdle for safe-keeping; they are all I have brought you," sighed Tito, "but I knew that you loved flowers, and they were all I could afford."

The seeds were planted that very day and carefully watered and tended. Great was the joy of the mother over the plants her son had brought her.

One day she arose earlier than usual and peeped from the lattice window of her whitewashed hut, when lo! there were the flowers in full bloom—deep red they were with petals as soft as satin. The mother clapped her hands and called softly to her boy, and together they went to the garden.

ple's, for several reasons. For instance,

"What shall we call them?" asked the mother.

"They came from Syria, which they tell me means 'rose' in that language, and I gathered the seed on the Damascus road, so let us call them Damask roses," replied Tito happily.

From that time this name has clung to this variety of roses, and from that little rose-bush have come all the seeds of these flowers which are to be found in Europe and America.—Boys and Girls.

CUBA.

Rt. Rev. H. R. Hulse, D. D., Bishop.

Changes in Clerical and Lay Personnel in Cuba.

The Rev. S. C. Carreras, of Camaguey, has gone to Santa Cruz del Norte. Mr. Carreras speaks English in addition to his native language, Spanish, and will be able to minister to the many Jamaicans at the Hershey sugar mills a few miles distant on top of the hill overlooking the town. His place in Camaguey will be taken by the Rev. John McCarthy, from La Gloria. Mr. McCarthy also has two languages, and will be able to minister to the two congregations, English-speaking and Spanish-speaking, in Camaguey.

The Rev. Joseph Holdcroft has gone to La Gloria from Guantanamo. He will have an American congregation, and possibly some work among the Cuban population in the neighborhood.

The church in Guantanamo, the city of Guantanamo, the naval station there, and the whole district of Cuba has experienced a great and distinct loss in the departure of the Rev. William Watson to Mexico. He had won the esteem and affection of the whole populace and ministered to three congregations: the Jamaicans of the city and neighborhood, the Cubans, and, for a time, the naval station of the United States located there.

The Rev. J. M. Lopez-Guillen, who has been on leave of absence during the past year and acting as professor in the University of the South, having been appointed Archdeacon of the Oriente, will make Guantanamo his headquarters, and from that point provide for the missions in Oriente province, and nearby.

The economic conditions of the Island of Cuba do not improve as yet to any extent. It is said that in the country districts many people are suffering the pangs of hunger; that there is neither bread nor vegetables, and that the only food for each colonia is one bull a day, sometimes provided by the sugar company, but anyhow obtained and killed and distributed among the people. There are those who declare that unless relief comes soon there will be another uprising of the populace, and many of the serious-minded Cubans assert that there can be no relief except through another intervention of the United States Government. Mr. Norman Davis is here with an American commission for the purpose of inspecting the conditions and offering whatever assistance may be possible and welcome. Much is expected and hoped of this commission.

A new school has been opened in Neuva Gerona, on the Isle of Pines, by the Rev. W. H. Decker, the indefatigable priest in charge of the missions on that Island. It has been placed in the hands of Mrs. Frank Ramsdell, once a teacher in the Diocesan School in Springfield, Ill., the pioneer churchwoman on that Island, and one who has always combined missionary work with home duties, always giving the precedence to the extension of the Church.

PITTSBURGH

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Unique Services at Calvary Church.

Calvary Church, Pittsburgh, has had two rather unique Sunday evening services, one for the faculty and students of Carnegie Technical Institute on October 16, and for the faculty and students of the University of Pittsburgh on the 23d. Some prominent clergymen outside the parish preaches, and there is special music by the choir. After the service an informal reception is held in the parish house, to which other clergymen come after their services are over, so that the students have opportunity to meet them. Light refreshments are served, and the result of the service and subsequent gathering is the promotion of good fellowship among the students.

Mr. H. D. W. English, Bible class teacher in Calvary Church, has lately been elected president of the Allegheny County Sunday School Association.

Clerical Union Has Interesting Meeting: The October meeting of the Clerical Union was devoted to matters of diocesan interest, and was held at St. Peter's Church, Pittsburgh, on the 17th, with a service at 11, followed by luncheon, and an afternoon session. The subject for the day was "The Plans, Hopes and Expectations of the Work of the Diocese." The speakers were the diocesan executives, the Rev. Homer Flint, Ph. D., Administrative Secretary; the Rev. Milton S. Kanaga, Field Secretary; the Rev. J. C. H. Sauber, Civic Chaplain, and Miss Charlotte E. Forsyth, Superintendent of Religious Education.

The Rev. Reese F. Thornton was instituted into the rectorship of All Saints' Church, Pittsburgh, on Wednesday evening, October 19, by the Bishop of the Diocese. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Frederick G. Budlong, of the Church of the Ascension.

The Churchmen's dinner given under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Church Club, in behalf of the Nation-Wide Campaign, took place on the evening of October 20, at the McCreery dining-rooms, with an attendance of almost five hundred, representing a large proportion of the parishes of the Diocese.

Charitable Bequests: In the will of the late David Ford Henry, owner and proprietor, of the Hotel Henry, Pittsburgh, are the following charitable bequests: To Christ Church, Pittsburgh, of which Mr. Henry had been a member for many years, the sum of $12,000. After this and bequests to relatives and friends, the residue of the estate is to be invested in a trust by the executors, the income from which is to be paid quarterly, share and share alike to the four following institutions: The Episcopal Church Home, Pittsburgh; Kingsley House Association, Pittsburgh; and its auxiliary, the Lilian Fresh Air Home, Valencia; the Pittsburgh Free Home for Babies, Ingram, and the St. Barnabas' Free Home for Convalescent and Incurable Boys and Men, at Gibsonia. ROBERT THRUSTON HUBARD.

ROBERT THRUSTON HUBARD died Wednesday, September 28, 1921, at 11:40 o'clock A. M., at "Chellowe," his home in Buckingham County, Va., in the eighty-third year of his age. He had been an invalid for several years, but considerate acts of friends and gentle ministrations of loving hands had helped him to bear his burden of affliction and brightened his days with affection and sympathy. Stricken with pneumonia on the Sunday preceding his death, his enfeebled sfrength was unable to resist the inroads of the disease, and three days later, peacefully and without suffering, his noble spirit passed from the frail body and soared upward to the God Who gave it.

His funeral took place at his home on Friday, September 30, with the burial service of the Episcopal Church, his son, Rev. Lyttleton E. Hubard, assisted by Rev. Asa D. Watkins and Rev. L. C. Moore, officiating. His body was placed at rest in the family cemetery by his brother Masons in a beautiful and impressive ceremony conducted by Mr. Alfred C. Garnett, Jr. These last rites were attended by a throng of people, old comrades of the Civil War, brother lawyers with whom he had practiced many years at the bar, neighbors whom he had aided with friendly counsel and sage advice, old and young alike. From all walks of life they came to look for the last time upon the face of their old friend, and as a parting tribute of love and devotion to place their flowers upon his grave. One of the most impressive features of the funeral service was the presence of most of the surviving slaves of the Hubard family.

He rests beside his wife and three children, who preceded him to the grave, in the old burying-ground where lie the remains of his ancestors and relations for generations back, among them Robert Thruston Hubard, Sr., James Thruston Hubard, Lenaeus Bolling, Powhatan Bolling, Judge Philip A. Bolling and Edmund Wilcox.

The deceased was born March 9, 1839, the son of Robert Thruston Hubard and Susan Pocahontas Bolling, his wife, and was the eighth in direct descent from the Indian Pocahontas. He married in 1870 Sallie Edmunds, a daughter of John R. Edmunds, of Halifax County.

Colonel Hubard is survived by a brother and sister, Philip A. Hubard, of Cumberland County, and Mrs. Lewis C. Randolph, of Nelson County, and by five children, Rev. L. E. Hubard, of New Jersey; R. T. Hubard, Jr., a lawyer of West Virginia; Mrs. John Bell Henneman, Philip E. Hubard and Mrs. Albert J. Terrell, of Buckingham County.

The old home place, "Chellowe," where Colonel Hubard has spent practically all his life, has never been out of the family, having been patented to his ancestor, John Bolling, during the reign of George II in 1748. Standing on a rounding hill among stately oaks, it is a handsome mark of former days of wealth and aristocracy.

After several years' study under tutors, Colonel Hubard attended Professor Dinwiddie's School for Boys at Greenwood, in Albemarle County, and later the Episcopal High School. He was graduated from Hampden-Sidney College in 1860, taking first honor and delivering the valedictory address for his class. He went from there to the University of Virginia for law under the celebrated Dr. Minor, where his studies were interrupted in April, 1861, by the outbreak of the war, in which he volunteered and did valiant service. He enlisted and served as a private, was promoted to first lieutenant and advanced to captain of the Cumberland County Light Dragoons, which became Company G, Third Cavalry, Fitzhugh Lee's Brigade, Stuart's Division, Army Northern Virginia, and saw active service to the close of the war.

Colonel Hubard was a consistent member of the Episcopal Church and a member of the Delta Kappa Epsilon Fraternity. He was a fluent and often eloquent speaker, a lawyer of pronounced ability, and when a younger man was a worthy foe to the best legal talent of the State. He served in the State Legislature from 1875 to 1877, and several times represented his party in national conventions. He was a man of high aims, pure character and sterling worth, and a citizen of patriotic devotion and lofty idealism, believing that the good of the county, the State and the nation should be the first consideration of all public servants. He had many friends bound to him by ties of loyalty and great devotion, and his passing breaks a strong link that bound the younger generation of today to the standards, the traditions and the ideals of the past.

Thus has passed from life through death into eternity one of the most commanding figures of his section of the State.

"I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith."

MRS. EMMA BACKUS PRICE.

Entered into the rest that remaineth for the people of God, on Tuesday, August 2, 1921, EMMA BACKUS PRICE, the wife of Charles T. Price. The funeral was from the house on Thursday, August 4, and she was laid to rest in the quiet burying-ground of the Presbyterian Church near Gala, Va.

Mrs. Price was seventy-five years of age. The last few years of her life were days smitten with weakness and touched with pain, all of which she bore, not only with equanimity and calm, but with a victorious joy that made it plain to any one that "in all these things we are more than conquerors."

Mrs. Price was Miss Emma Backus Pettigrew, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Mathew Ward and Pauline Backus Pettigrew. On May 10, 1876, she was married to Charles T. Price, of Fincastle, Va., and they made their home at "The Bluff," near Gala, Botetourt County, Va. Their union was blessed with five children, Dr. Laurence Taylor Price, of Richmond; Mrs. A. W. Koiner, of Richmond; Nellie Ward, Marguerite Worthington, and Kathleen Gertrude.

No one can know all that Mrs. Price was as wife and mother save those of her own immediate circle. But as the home at "The Bluff" has always been a house with open doors, there are many who have been helped and cheered by her outgoing sympathy and love. Her wonderful personality is an abiding memory. She was an interesting conversationalist, and "in her tongue was the law of kindness." She was faithful in every relation. Her love has mothered many lonely hearts; her sympathy was given freely to every sorrowing soul; her simple abiding Christian faith was part of her being. She was wise and tender and true; and her kindness was extended alike to rich and poor, to every class and condition. "We ne'er shall see her like again."

May God, through His Holy Spirit, bless and comfort the loved ones of her home, and may He keep the memory of her pure and holy life fresh in the hearts of all who knew her, as an inspiration, to follow in the footsteps of the blessed Christ!

REV. THOMAS HOWELL.

At a meeting of the Executive Committee of James River Convocation, Diocese of Southwestern Virginia, the following was made a matter of record:

1. Be it resolved, that the James River Convocation bows in sorrow to the divine will in the passing and promotion of our beloved co-worker, REV. THOMAS HOWELL.

2. His service as Treasurer of James River Convocation, and of the undivided Convocation of Southwest Virginia, was marked by a faithfulness and devotion to his trust as was rarely equalled and seldom surpassed.

3. His personality spread around him at all times an atmosphere of devotion and piety which was altogether beautiful. To know him was to love this man of simple life, a real Christian soldier and servant of Christ Jesus to his life's end.

Bishop Tucker's Pastoral Letter.

Bishop Tucker, in a pastoral letter to his people, calls their attention to the great missionary spirit exhibited in the past, and urges them forward in the following words:

"One special ground of thanksgiving to Almighty God in the Dioceses of Virginia is the fact that He honored us by permitting us to send across the seas the first missionaries to Africa, to China, to Japan and to Brazil, and that through all the years the sons and daughters of Virginia have been laboring for Christ in every part of the field, at home and abroad.

May the Spirit of Christ inspire us all to labor with Him to bring all the nations of the world under the sway of His blessed gospel, that they may share in the glorious liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free."

Rt. Rev. Geo. W. Davenport, D. D., Bishop.

Memorial to the Late Bishop Adams.

On Friday, November 4, the Bishop and a large number of the diocesan clergy met at the Cathedral in Easton in a memorial service to the late Rt. Rev. William Forbes Adams, D. D., LL. D., D. C. L., Bishop of this Diocese from 1887 till his death in March, 1920, the Bishop of the Diocese being celebrant. The sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. John Gardner Murray, D. D., Bishop of Maryland, dwelling on the life of the late Bishop. After the service the bishops and clergy in vestments and laymen present marched in procession to the cemetery, quite near, and unveiled the Bishop's monument, which is a facsimile of the one erected to the memory of Bishop Lay, the first Bishop of the Diocese. All then returned to the Cathedral, where addresses on the life of Bishop Adams were made by several of the clergy and laity. The inscription on the four sides of the monument follows:

"Rt. Rev. William Forbes, Adams, D. D., D. C. L., LL. D., Second Bishop of Easton, 1887-1920."

"A faithful and true friend, a wise counsellor, a loyal bishop in the Church of Christ."

"His speech was always with grace seasoned with salt."

"Born January 2, 1833; died March 5, 1920; admitted to the bar in 1854, ordained deacon 1859, ordained priest 1860; consecrated January 17, 1875; translated to Easton August 5, 1887."

Dr. Drane's Forty-fifth Anniversary.

St. Paul's Parish, Edenton, marked the Rev. Dr. R. B. Drane's forty-fifth anniversary as rector by sending him a testimonial drawn up by the vestry, personally signed by each member, expressing their high esteem and personal affection, and in grateful appreciation of his consecrated and never-failing service in his ministry and in the community. They also presented to the Rev. Frederick B. Drane, who has returned to his home after six years of missionary work in Alaska, a gold wrist-watch especially adapted for his use in Alaska. The community reception which was to have been given by the parish in honor of Dr. Drane and Mrs. Drane, Alaska, was called off on account of the sad death on All Saints' Day of Mrs. George C. Wood, a young member of the congregation, who was an intimate conection of the Drane family and who was greatly mourned in the community.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Croswell McBee, rector of St. John the Evangelist, Lansdowne, Pa., has received a call to become rector of Old St. David's Church, Radnor, Pa. Mr. McBee has been rector of St. John's Church eighteen years, and since he has been there the affairs of the church have been raised to a high standard and the membership largely increased.

The Rev. Sanford L. Rotter, of the Diocese of North Carolina, has accepted a call to Whittle Parish, The Plains, Fauquier County, Va., and will take charge about the first of the new year.

The Rev. William O. Leslie, Jr., was instituted as rector of Christ Church, Newark, N. J., on Sunday, October 30, by Bishop Lines. He will also serve on the staff of the City Mission, which has charge of all the institutions of Essex County, the work requiring more than the service of the Rev. Dr. Cooder.

The Rev. Thomas Hubert Jones has been appointed minister in charge of St. Bartholomew's Church, Wissinoning, Pa., and began his work there October 30. He succeeds the Rev. Aziel Coates, who goes to the Diocese of Harrisburg to become rector of St. Paul's Church, Manheim, and assume charge of Hope Church, Mount Hope, Pa.

The Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, Va., was the preacher on Sunday afternoon, November 6, at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York.

The Rev. Alan Pressley Wilson, rector of St. John's Church, Marietta, Pa., has been elected secretary of the Marietta Ministerial Association, comprising the pastors of all the Protestant denominations. Mr. Wilson has also received an invitation to preach the annual Thanksgiving sermon at the community union services which will be held this year in the Presbyterian Church on Thanksgiving evening.

Mr. Mervin R. Baxter, of City Island, N. Y., a postulant for Holy Orders, has taken up the work among the whites on the Wind River Reservation, Wyo.

The address of the Rev. David Campbell Mayers is changed from Greenwood, Va., to Middleburg, Va.

Deaconess Virginia Mitchell is doing missionary work in Dubois and vicinity (Wyoming). She has secured a little furnished one room log cabin, which she intends to make a social center of the community. She is assisting Dean Smith in establishing a "Home Department" among the ranchers who are too far to be able to attend church or Sunday schools.

Ordinations.

In St. Stephen's Church, Romney, W. Va., Mr. L. O. Forqueran was ordered deacon by the Bishop of West Virginia, the Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., on Thursday, November 3. He was presented by the Rev. Ilbert L. Brayshaw. The sermon was preached by Archdeacon W. P. Chrisman. Morning Prayer was said at 8 o'clock by Rev. I. L. Brayshaw, assisted by Mr. Forqueran, the ordination service being held at 11 o'clock. After services a delightful luncheon was served to about thirty friends at the New Century Hotel. The Rev. L. O. Forqueran has been lay worker in charge of St. Stephen's, Romney, and Emanuel, Moorefield, since leaving the Virginia Seminary last June, and will continue as deacon in charge of these points.

On St. Luke's Day the Rev. Wilbur Q. Rogers, in charge of the colored work at St. Matthias' Mission, Atlanta, was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Mikell. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Cyril E. Bentley, Executive Secretary of the Diocese; the sermon was preached by the Very Rev. Thomas H. Johnston, dean of St. Philip's Cathedral, Atlanta. The Litany was read by Archdeacon Braithwaite, in charge of the colored work. The Epistle was read by the Rev. T. T. Pollard, minister in charge of St. Stephen's Mission, Griffin, Ga., and the School.

On November 2, in St. Thomas' Church, Newark, N. J., Mr. Robert Thorpe was ordained deacon by Bishop Lines, the Rev. Dr. Charles P. Tinker being the preacher. Mr. Thorpe has been doing most useful missionary work as a lay reader for many years, and is now ordained at the age of seventy-five, to continue such work in the Diocese. His most useful record made the ordination of special interest, and about forty of the clergy were present. Bishop Stearly took the service of Holy Communion.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Grumbling in a Christian is a sign that he is neglecting prayer.

The more we love others the more we may know about God's love for us.

If we talk about Christ we shall never run out of something to say.

The man who claims that there is no such thing as an honest man tells others what he thinks of himself.

The most valuable gift of a man or a woman to the world is not money or books, but a noble life.

Our first and our chief thought in the inner chamber should be faith in God's love. Seek, as you set yourself to pray, to exercise great and unbounded faith in the love of God.—Andrew Murray.

The Bible writes hope over the darkest fields of life. Man needs hope above all things; and the Bible is the charter of hope, the message of the God of revelation, Who alone is the God of hope.—Bishop Wescott.

One of the greatest obstacles we have to overcome is the desire to do things in our own way. It is not our part to guide our life in our own way; it is our part to be obedient to our Master's signals. He is at the helm.—F. D. Tyner.

Seest thou the color of the leaves,
Hearest thou the rustling of the corn,
These signs are of the autumn time;
Look! even in these
Thou too shalt see
The hand of Him
Who is the Giver
Of every good and perfect thing.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., NOVEMBER 19, 1921. No. 47

THANKSGIVING IN COMMUNITY SERVICE

It is not a mere coincidence which leads us to publish in this Thanksgiving number of the Southern Churchman the account of "What One Man Has Done for His City." The message of that story belongs with the message of Thanksgiving Day.

For Thanksgiving is not an individual, but a civic festival. It calls to us as a people to give thanks for what God has given to the nation. It seeks to consecrate our patriotism and re-dedicate our spirits in nobler loyalty to the common good. But sometimes we think that such an appeal as this is vague. How can we show our gratitude for our heritage? men ask. Where is any practical consequence of the idea of Thanksgiving?

To that question the article we publish gives at least one answer. It is the answer of a fine example of one man who felt his debt to the community to which he belonged, and who proceeded to serve that community with noble imagination. The trouble with most of us is that we never stop to consider the contribution which has come to us from other lives. The success which even the ablest and most brilliant individual may achieve is built upon foundations which he for himself never conceivably could have laid. A common language, a common human experience, a relationship of trust and co-operation, a machinery of credit, an interplay of industrial forces slowly developed through the centuries—all these lie back of any business venture, and without these the individual would be helpless. Thousands of lives, both in the present and in the past, thousands of men and women, whose names he can never know, are indirect factors in the success of any man who is born, and works, and wins his way in any community of our modern time. Therefore, such a man owes a debt to his community. Legally, he has a right to use his money for himself and to leave his money when he dies—as so many rich men do—to nobody outside the circle of a few relatives who are as greedy as himself; but in a higher sense he has no such right. To the community which has given the materials for success to him, he ought to give back the materials for finer life for all the people.

At this Thanksgiving time, therefore, let men successful in material affairs ponder the example of what one man has done for his neighbors, and what others, if they will, can do for theirs.

CREATORS OF PEACE

We have had our war-makers. They have performed their function, which appeared a necessary, though a tragic one. But now we need the makers of a nobler thing. We need the builders of a peace within which men shall work together in the dignity of a mutual service and the joy of that fine self-expression which can come only to a civilization which has stopped wasting its energies in snarling hatreds, and is lifted up into the common loyalty of a large idea.

But who are the makers of peace, as Jesus thought of them, and what is the way to its making?

First, the peace-makers are those who have made their peace with God. There is no more frequent failure in all human affairs than that which proceeds from ignorant force. Men plan their shrewd stratagems as to how by combinations among themselves they will get peace. They will organize on their side forces which shall compel it. They will make their own influence so powerful that others cannot resist it. But the peace which is made that way is only a shell which any moment may destroy. "Herein do I exercise myself," said St. Paul, "to have always a conscience void of offense toward God and toward man." The only peace which can endure is the peace which is founded upon the conscious desire to square our plans, first of all, with the purposes of God.

That seems a very simple thing. It may seem so obvious that many will be tempted to dismiss it as a poor truism when we were hoping, perhaps, if we hoped for anything at all, for some new and vivid suggestion as to a way by which our time can be made better. But here is a fundamental and absolute necessity. We ignore it at our peril, for whether ignored or recognized, it is sovereign still. The time has come when we must stop thinking of the arguments for our own advantage. We must be still before God, and ask, each one for himself, not what I and my class and my nation are justified in doing because of the selfishness in what others are doing, but what is the duty for us as we stand with attentive consciousness before the moral realities of God. Which way do duty and service and honor lie? Where, above the skies of mean considerations, are the great peaks of those divine realities on which the sunlight rests?

If we have done this first great thing, the second will not be difficult. If we have sought to make our conscience void of offense toward God, we shall already have gone the great way to make it void of offense toward men. It is possible in this world to suffer injustice; it is possible to choose a course of action in which materially we gain less than we would have gained if we had gone forward with a deliberate selfishness; it is possible that we may have to pay the price for spiritual idealism which has great ends in view. These things may be regrettable, but they are not calamitous. The only real calamity is to do injustice. The only real failure is to be so immersed in selfish calculations that all our ideals are made to fail. The victory which our world needs is the victory of its soul over the evil and disintegrating forces that assail it. And that victory for all men will not be won until the few men are brave enough and purposeful enough to set the example of winning it in themselves. Here, then, is the call to all souls today who would help our age to its redemption by manifesting in their own choices and consecrated will the victory that must be won within.

ARMISTICE DAY ADDRESS

Delivered in St. Paul's Church, Richmond, Va., by John Stewart Bryan

There is an incident in the New Testament which very wonderfully reproduces our state of mind today. Three disciples, Peter, James and John, had been in touch with the great minds of Moses and Elijah. For a moment those poor fishermen had been lifted above all earthly bonds; they walked in glad converse and intimate association with the liberated souls of the mighty dead who were alive forevermore; they saw the light that never was on land or sea; they heard the voice of God itself; they had an asurrance passing all human power of comprehension or expression. And a few moments later, coming down from the mountain, they found their fellow-disciples impotent and helpless before one poor possessed boy. But Christ was not helpless; He cast out the devil, and to His discouraged and disheartened followers He said: "This kind cometh not forth but by prayer and fasting."

Three years ago today we stood on the summit of our Mount of Transfiguration. Before us marched with shining faces and transfigured countenances all the illustrious dead who had died to make an end of death.

The war to end war was won; the elevation of spirit that was then ours we thought should never depart—illimitable power, unbreakable contact with God, infinite pity for the smaller peoples, compelling compassion for the sorrows of the wounded world—all, all that was our heritage, and through the skies we heard with clear certainty the approval of God Himself of the work we had done.

The voice of America made the heart of the world tremble and vibrate with glad anticipation of Peace. Our spokesman, Woodrow Wilson, was hailed as no conqueror ever had been hailed, in England, France and Italy; all the pent-up sorrows, all the hopeless aspirations of a harried and dismembered world seemed to find their guarantee of fulfilment in his large and generous speech. Now we have come down from our Mount. Little did we think that at the foot of our Mount of Transfiguration we should meet with men still possessed of the old devils of militarism and greed and cruelty and the love of riches and the lusts of the flesh! Little did we believe that our sense of new-found power would vanish, and that we should stand as the apostles stood, shame-faced and silent, before the wrongs we could not cure and devils we could not exorcise.

That is exactly what has happened to us, but no view of life is worth anything that is not a long view, and there is comfort for the future by comparison with the past. Had the story of the gospel closed with the statement of Christ, "This kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting," we would never have known that the mere shadow of Peter and John would heal the sick in the streets; we would never have known that the crippled man at the gate of the temple would have leaped with rejoicing at their word. But we do know those facts; we do know that prayer and fasting work miracles; and we do know the power of God is not limited or cut off, but that by prayer and fasting it has spread until even today in this Valley of Humiliation, and in these mists of misery, we still have the spirit and the faith to look to the far-shining goal that Christ came to bring and Christianity lives to proclaim.

It is an easy sneer to ask, How will your fasting feed starving Russia? How will your prayers affect the Shinto elder statesman of Japan, or the agnostic delegates of France? Nothing is easier or more futile than cynical pessimism.

Cynical pessimism is the last resort of him who has never known, and who not knowing is unwilling to believe in the creative and transforming power of faith. It is not Christians alone who have the faith that removes mountains. There is the Hindu mystic Ghandi whose faith in the future of India's freedom has shaken English power as it has not been shaken since the mutiny of 1857—but that revolt was active, while this is passive.

There is the agnostic Shelley, who wrote of faith and forgiveness:

> To suffer woes that hope thinks infinite,
> To forgive wrongs blacker than death or night,
> To withstand power that seems omnipotent, etc.

Oh, no! You cannot combat cynicism with satire, nor pessimism with platitudes. Cynicism and pessimism are states of mind, and those devils can only be cast out by the expulsive power of a new and more vital state of mind.

This sounds like mere mongering of words, I know; but if I could tell you that there was a vital state of mind that could not be dethroned, a state of mind that actually and inevitably meant joy and happiness and wealth and peace and strength and health to its possessor, you could not fail but hear. And there is such a state of mind for the world in its individual capacity; for the world as a collection of individuals; for "cities, councils, governments and men."

I will characterize that state of mind for you quite baldly. It is love. It was not a miracle of imagination to see that a voice that could be carried a quarter of a mile by telephone could be carried around the world. The miracle was in making, not in extending, the discovery of the telephone. You will instantly think of thousands of other examples. And in every case the great step was in finding a new principle. The power of the Bible is not in its folklore, or its music, or its ritual, or its history; and the power of the Bible is in its discovery of, and its faith in, and its application of, the supreme law of life—and that law is Love. Ten thousand times ten thousand individuals have proclaimed and proved the truth of that law in their own lives. Every family, every clan, every city, every nation that has ever tried it has added its testimony to the irrefragable truth that love is the law of life, and hate the assurance of death. Divine revelation was needed to show us the way of love, but it is humanity, and humanity alone, that can apply love to human life. To refuse to act upon the evidence of two thousand years is no case of praiseworthy caution on the part of thinking men. Far from it. It is a deliberate reversion to the cowardice, the inertia and the hate of the jungle. What does it mean to go back to the jungle? Well! It means that you voluntarily put your sons, and daughters too, under the malevolent menace of the madness that thinks to gain abundant life by pouring out unmeasured death.

This church has known the supreme glory and the utter depression of war. And this church knows that the unique splendor of the Christian religion is that it gives glory to one without sorrow to another—that its radiance requires no background of horrid darkness; that its success is not built on another's failure, nor its triumphs on another's defeat. It was not war that glorified General Lee; it was General Lee that glorified war, because he brought into that cauldron of sin and suffering the refreshment of one who had been a friend of Christ, because through the smoke of battle he made visible the imperishable brightness of the Knight Companion of God.

And as from the valley of our failure, we look back to the heights where we stood so securely three years ago. What are our thoughts and our resolves on this Armistice Day? When the armistice was declared we thought that our sole duty was to sing Te Deums, when our real need was to chant Misereres. We fought for the love of God, and we allowed our motives to be distorted into hatred of Germany; we sacrificed billions of money to make the world a fit place for Christ's followers, and then we betrayed our silent dead by using the victory their sacrifices had won to make the world a paradise for money-changers. And now the crop that was sowed in hatred has come to be reaped in bitterness. Now we know, we prayer-book Christians, that Edith Cavell was right when she said to her chaplain, "Patriotism is not enough. I must have no hatred or bitterness towards any one." What Christ taught as the final revelation of the God and Father of us all, science is confirming every day by example and investigation. Hatred is sin, selfishness is sin; gain for self is loss of self, and the whole tragic sequence is summed up in just five words:

"The wages of sin is death."

Now, mark you, there are no exceptions. The individual Pilate and the collective empire of Augustus are both subject to that law. And you and I and the United States of America and the world are subject to it, too.

He is a blind and fatuous fool who today does not stand appalled at the demons at the foot of that Mount of Transfiguration, and the work of those demons spells, and inexorably spells DEATH.

What are you going to do? And what did the disciples of Jesus do? Apparently they did little at first. Within a few brief months their little faith flickered and failed. "They all forsook Him and fled." Peter, who had witnessed it all, denied Him with protesting oaths. But they redeemed themselves, for God's processes, though long, are absolutely certain, and in redeeming themselves they redeemed the world. How? By prayer and fasting—just that!

But how can the prayer and fasting of those far off disciples affect our problems of today? I will tell you.

The growth of religion, the growth of life, the growth of our government, is from the inside out. It is first the individual and the family, then the State and the Church. The greatest example that the world has yet seen in self-government is the United States of America. Do you know that in the present form of our government we are the oldest government of any civilized nation on earth? And our government was made possible by just two things —prayer and fasting. It was the prayer of every patriot, it was the faith made perfect by fasting that gave us that detachment, that wonderful power, of synthesis that out of all the theories of government then in the world produced this government of ours. [If there is any better way for clarifying a man's mind, and for giving him more ability to see things in their essential relationships than prayer, I do not know it. We have facts enough in the world today to solve the problem of cancer, for example, if we only had the brains to integrate those facts.] The reason that Washington and Jefferson and Madison and Marshall were able to make the Constitution that has made America what it is was because of their sublime, detached and unselfish faith, and to this faith was added fasting.

Did you ever think of what self-denial Virginia and other States undertook for the glory of God, for the welfare of mankind, for the founding and maintenance of our government, when they laid aside the right to tax imports and the exports from their borders? Virginia had tobacco; the Carolinas had rise; Georgia had cotton; Pennsylvania had coal; New England had pine, and all of them gave up their individual benefits for the larger good of America. Out of that fasting came the strength that has made us today, and we say it reverently, and with the fullest sense of its obligation, the greatest nation in the world.

And what the Colonies did in 1789 the world must do today. There must be prayer to know God's will, and glad renunciation of everything opposed to it.

Today we bring home and bury our unknown dead, and in that ideal we are saying that the principle is ever greater than the man, that the goal is ever higher than the seeker, and that God is ever greater than the world.

We are faced by the powers which we have loosed and cannot control. We cannot limit war by war, or selfishness by greed, or exploitation by compact. There is but one principle that can guide this world today; that principle the disciples found by prayer and fasting; that principle we can make ours by the same process.

Oh, let us pray that God will illumine our hearts with His will; let us cast away all those sins and greeds and lusts that so easily beset us; let us from the plenitude of our power replenish the hungry and the cold; let us defend the weak; let us educate the ignorant; let us encourage the timid; let us repress the old workers of iniquity, and so on to the city of God!

So, and so alone, shall we be fit to meet and know face to face that mighty throng of unknown heroes who died that the flame of liberty might live, and who now stand before

> "God and all that chivalry of His,
> The soldier saints who row on row
> Burn upward each to his point of bliss."

Today once more we walk irradiated for an instant with the glory of the ideals of our nation and our dead of three years ago. Oh, let us pray and fast so that on our faces may come the added radiance that is now on the faces of our own known and unknown dead, in that fair City, which has no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine, for the glory of God does lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.

TRIBUTE TO HEROES OF WAR

Address Delivered in the Rotunda of the Capitol by the Rev. Dr. James E. Freeman, Rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C. in Connection with the Ceremonies of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, November 10, 1921

SYMBOLIZED in the silent form of this unknown martyr of a great war, we stand as in the presence of the heroic dead of our sovereign nation. Well may we on such an occasion recall the words of Lincoln: "The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did there." Poor indeed is any eulogy our human lips may fashion, and inadequate indeed is any offering our feeble hands may bring. This sleeping soldier's bier is like a nation's shrine—its new altar of high consecration. Before its costly sacrifice all our best endeavors seem but poor and mean, and all our gifts and pomp and ceremony are as ephemereal as the fleeting shadows of the evening hour.

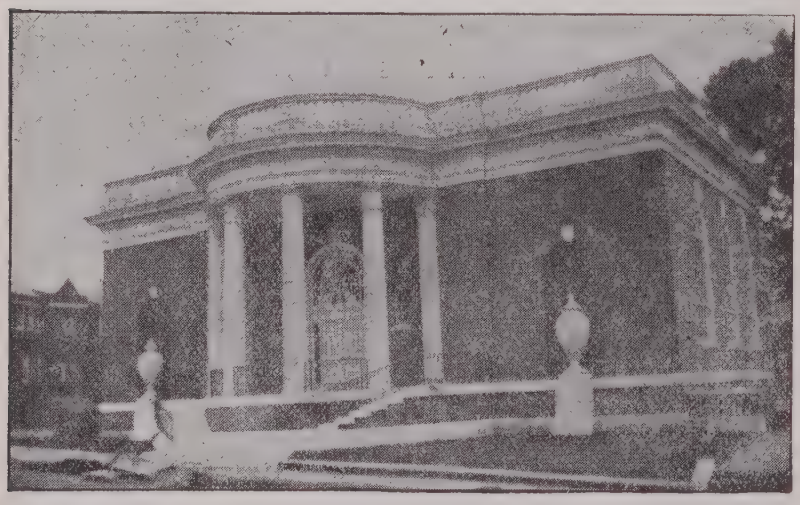
We are not permitted on this occasion to call the long roll of those whose blue stars have turned to autumn gold —true symbol of accomplishment. We may only say:

> "These laid the world away, poured out the red,
> Sweet wine of youth; gave up the years to be
> Of work and joy, and that unhoped serene
> That men call age; and those who would have been
> Their sons, they gave, their immortality."

The sons of America, living and dead, who answered the call to the colors, present to us a challenge and an opportunity that we dare not lightly esteem. We shall hardly honor them by noisy plaudits or words of empty praise. The present pregnant hour is made more solemn for us by what they did. They ushered in a new and golden age; they destroyed forever our selfish ideas of insularity and proud isolation. They placed a new accent upon the meaning and purpose of universal brotherhood. They taught us that the greatness of a nation consists, not in what it holds, but in what it shares. They stripped away the artificial trappings of our growing pride and arrogance, and for the value of things temporal and material they made clear to our vision the unmeasured worth of things spiritual and eternal. They taught us again the meaning of those immortal words, "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it."

Here in the very heart and centre of our national being, beneath the uplifted dome of the capitol, we stand today to catch the newer and finer meaning of what America must henceforth be to the nations of the world. We stand before this representative of our honored dead, pledged to carry forward that for which he and his comrades gave the last full measure of devotion. We shall be true to this rendezvous with death if we here highly and solemnly resolve to give all that we are and have that American ideals may, in their finest expression and their fullest interpretation, be maintained in the face of all the changed and chances of this eventful age. Let us be reminded that this nation is avowedly Christian, and that as the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church, even so shall the blood of our sacred dead be the fruitful seed of an American reborn—the undaunted champion of impartial justice, the chivalrous guardian of liberty and the unfailing exponent of righteousness. It has been said of Abraham Lincoln that he found his soul by the grave of Ann Rutledge. God grant that it may be said of this nation that it, too, found its soul by the grave of its unknown soldier. Unknown in name, he becomes the son of every moth, the brother of every man, the high type and representative of American chivalry and American fidelity. He needs no name; he requires no identity; suffice it that he is wrapped in the flag he dared to follow and died to preserve.

Unknown soldier of the legion, the embodiment and representative of our beloved dead, we feel in thy presence the influence of those mystic chords that from the countless graves of thy comrades reach to every hearthstone throughout the land. May the God before Whom stand the spirits of just men made perfect, make us true to our solemn trust, inspiring us with fine fidelity and intelligent zeal to bear our full part; thus hastening that day when a righteous peace shall cover the earth even as the waters cover the sea.



WHAT ONE MAN HAS DONE FOR HIS COMMUNITY

The MacIntire Gifts to Charlottesville, and Albemarle County, Virginia

(The spirit of Christianity is not a matter merely of individual conduct. It has to do with all a man's relationship to his fellows. It ought to make a man a better citizen, by quickening his sense of responsibility for the human brotherhood of his own community. It ought to inspire the rich man to such use of his wealth as shall add beauty and richness to the life around him. Therefore it is of interest in a Church paper to tell the story of how, in a particular community, this spirit of public pride and generous responsibility has been exemplified. It is told not only as an account of what has been done, but for an inspiration to others in other places who may be inspired to do likewise.—Editor's Note.)

THOUGH the homes of Jefferson, Madison and Monroe, of governors of Virginia and other famous characters, were in or near the city in days long gone, Charlottesville, Va., never had a benefactor who gave the city rich gifts of gold and superb art until Mr. Paul Goodloe MacIntire, after a most successful business career in the North, returned to the scenes of his boyhood days. Conscious of an obligation to make his life and wealth count in the promotion of the higher interests of his fellowmen, desiring to leave the world a little better for his having lived in it, he immediately began to do the things which have already blessed the community beyond words.

Old as man's ability to draw and color and carve is the aspiration for cities nobly beautiful. The imaginations of souls responsive to the appeal to beauty have pictured cities transformed and glorified by art. In every age this dream has been the inspiration of practical achievements that are among the most wonderful accomplishments of the race. What school boy is not familiar with the storied beauty of Babylon, the splendor of Carthage as Turner painted it, the ripe loveliness of Athens, and the rich magnificence of Rome?

"To make us love our city, we must make our city lovely," is the motto of the Municipal Art League of New York. Paul G. MacIntire saw an opportunity to make Charlottesville more lovely and lovable. He realized that men do not live by bread alone, and that no city can most beneficently influence its citizens whose only monuments are factories, warehouses, stores and theatres, important as all of these are.

Though a city of culture, largely because the home of the University of Virginia, Charlottesville had no art treasures. No works of men of creative genius adorned her streets, and there were no public parks for her people to enjoy. In meeting these needs so splendidly, Mr. MacIntire has rendered this community a great service—a service not confined merely to Charlottesville, but extending wherever the visitor carries the memory and inspiration of his remarkable gifts.

His first gift was that of the Lewis-Clark monument. It is a bronze group consisting of Meriwether Lewis, William Clark and the Indian squaw Sarajawea, imposed on a granite base. The monument bears the inscription, "Bold and far-seeing pathfinders who carried the flag of the young republic to the western ocean and revealed an unknown empire to the uses of mankind." Below the inscription, and beneath the thirteen stars of the thirteen original States, are the words, "A territory of 385,000 square miles was added to the country by the efforts of these men, an area larger than the then existing size of the United States." It was Jefferson's suggestion that caused Lewis and Clark to cross the wilderness between Virginia and the Pacific Ocean. The monument to these men that now stand in Midway Park was created by Charles Keck, of New York, one of the most famous of living sculptors.

George Rogers Clark, a brother of the William Clark who accompanied Meriwether Lewis across the continent, was the hero of Kaskaski and Vincennes and the conqueror of the northwest territory. To preserve the memory of his life and work in imperishable bronze was the task to which Mr. MacIntire next turned. He employed Robert Ingersoll Aitken, who produced one of the most remarkable bronze groups to be found anywhere. The story the sculptor tells in this group is so clear that the least imaginative may easily interpret the message. The monument was unveiled November 3, 1921.

Mr. MacIntire decided to further adorn his city with heroic equestrian statues of Lee and Jackson. He cleared two city blocks of buildings, and remade them into modern parks. In one stands the Jackson statue, by Charles Keck, a wonderfully spirited expression of the warrior-soul of old "Stonewall," the idol of the South, and respected throughout the nation. The statue was unveiled on the occasion of the recent Confederate Reunion, when thousands of people were present. The granite base of the monument is especially beautiful, with its carved reliefs of Valor and Faith bearing a shield before them, and a wreath of immortelles flanked with two pendent swords.

The well-known sculptor, Schrady, is at work upon an equestrian statue of Robert E. Lee. It will stand in Lee Park, and the pedestal is now in place.

The Public Library was also given by Mr. MacIntire. It is a colonial structure, and an architectural gem. The furniture is also colonial. The building and books and equipment were all given the city by Mr. MacIntire.

Two public playgrounds, each equipped with modern apparatus, one for white children and one for colored, were presented to the city by Mr. MacIntire.

His benefactions have not been confined to the city alone. He is assisting in the building of modern rural schools through the county of Albemarle, and providing literature and music to enrich the lives of country boys and girls. Weak churches and community centers have found in him a sympathetic, helpful friend.

The University of Virginia has been richly remembered by Mr. MacIntire. A Greek, open-air theatre, a classic gem, and unique on the continent of America, was dedicated on the occasion of the Centennial Celebration. Its great organ is one of the largest in the land. To give form and substance to Jefferson's dream of a school of art and architecture, he sent the University a check for $155,000. Later he gave another large sum to endow a department of commerce and finance, and still another to make possible annual public concerts by famous musicians and singers.

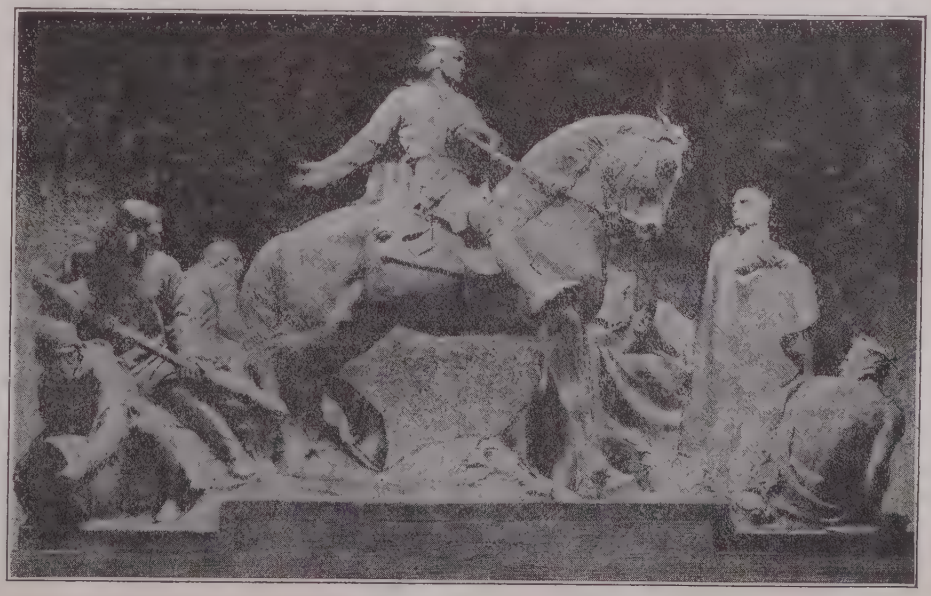
The Wild Adventure

The Rev. Louis Tucker.

The poised and self-possessed, gentle, white-haired, white-bearded presence of Dr. DuBose seems almost visible at the school which is his memorial. The writer, as one of his old pupils, made pilgrimage there the other day to renew memories. Dr. DuBose was a very wise man, one of the greatest theologians of his time, the maturest intellect, in his own speciality, of his age; and Dr. DuBose never grew old. The essential nature of the small boy was always in him. Physically one of the most domestic of beings, spiritually he was in sympathy with all adventure. He never ceased to be one of God's little children. The universe and the fulness thereof was always open to him. He would have made an ideal air-man. He had discovered De Soto's fountain of perpetual youth, and was in sympathy with taking any chance in service of that supreme Adventurer who was once a carpenter at Nazareth.



His memorial is worthy of him. The men who dreamed it are men of the great Adventure. Their trails are among the higher mountains, marked with souls wakened to God. Their totems are in the valleys, each a little building with a cross that points up to heaven. They have turned so many men and women toward the throne that surely they must be named before it; and now they have found a new way to multiply work eternal. The men who financed it are men of adventure. Their names are carefully withheld, according to the orders of One Who wished the right hand ignorant of the left; but in the whirlpool of world-finance they have not been drowned. The warden is a man of adventure. Those who knowhim need no proof of this. To those who do not, it is proof enough that he accepted the office as warden. All these were able to vision a great dream. Not one per cent. of the fat parishes know it, but the world is full of men who would be ministers of Jesus Christ and priests of our Church if they could. Having chosen some other path in life, drastic experience, black grief, great disaster or rainbow success, has brought them face to face with Jesus—too late. Too late, that is, to spend four years in the University and three in the Seminary and go slow—go slow—go slow. The hounds of heaven are on their heels. They cannot wait.

For such men, by such men, the wild adventure has been thrown open. Physically, it is a group of frame buildings, with sixty acres or so of land, on the main street of Monteagle, Tenn. In a business way it is board, lodging, instruction and the general pledge, "You shall be taken care of in return for labor." By title it is "The DuBose Memorial Church Training School"; and spiritually it does not yet appear what it shall be. But none of us is quite blind in spiritual matters, even though near-sighted, nor quite deaf, even though hard of hearing; and I, who hear in part and dimply see, bear witness that I think the Lord Jesus there and was reminded of the Apostolic times.

This autumn the warden went up to get ready. Everything was in confusion, of course. Next day a man got off a train. He had a letter from a Bishop. He had resigned a good position and wanted to join the school. He and the warden got themselves a meal or so, then found a cook. They needed a stenographer, for inquiries were pouring in. Another man dropped off another train —a skilled stenographer, who had resigned a good position and come to join. A farmer was needed—he came. A pipe broke. That afternoon there jogged into the yard a flivver containing two rabbits, two dogs, four kittens, three children, provisions for some weeks, one mechanical engineer's wife and one mechanical engineer. He had heard of the school, sold his business and come to join. His wife became one of the house managers. Another married man with children came up, and another. The adventure has a housekeeper, a matron and a house manager now. An electrician was needed. One came. A teacher was needed for the children—one came. An organist—one came. A choir leader—one came.

The warden was puzzled with the detail purchasing for a household of that size. One of Kress' purchasing agents resigned a $3,000 position, came up and joined. Every one is cared for and given a place in one of the departments of the school. The final intention is to pay a monthly salary and charge for board, lodging and washing; the salary to be about five dollars a month or so larger than the charge, thus furnishing a trifle of pocket money; but this is not in force yet. The day the writer was there the boys were putting in hay; and the joke of the day was that the farmer boys put a city man in the mow and buried him before he could tread down the hay. The job for the next day was to put in forty tons of coal for the furnace. The day after that to preach practice sermons all round. Each day, of course, were classes.

Each man has come up for a cause. It is practically the only shool in the country where all the students have to be kept from studying too much for health; and it is the only school known to the writer where the students seem to regard themselves as men enlisted in an army; are guided by an ideal and a dream; and think of themselves as adventurers, as soldiers in a war from which there is no release.

The warden says that a number of men have made the adventure by joining this school. It is possible that there may be many others who would like to join in this adventure by contributing to its support. I have no hesitation in saying that this is the most economically managed institution with which I am acquainted. The warden's address is Monteagle, Tenn.

A MESSAGE FOR THANKSGIVING DAY

"Behold, I Have Taught You Statutes and Judgments Even As the Lord My God Commanded Me. That Ye Should Do So in the Land Whither Ye Go to Possess It. Keep Therefore and Do Them, for This Is Your Wisdom and Your Understanding in the Sight of the Nations, Which Shall Hear All These Statutes and Say, Surely This Great Nation Is a Wise and Understanding People. For What Nation Is There So Great, Who Hath God So Nigh Unto Them, As the Lord Our God Is In All Things That We Call Upon Him For?" —Deuteronomy 4:55-7.

IF Israel long ago had reason to thank God for its physical heritage, how much more is that true of America today.

We look back upon our own history and marvel at its no less than epic grandeur. A little fleet of storm-tossed ships putting into a silent river, the perilous settlement of Jamestown on the lonely island with the wilderness at its gates, suffering and danger and grim distress, but through it all a fortitude that would not be denied; on the grim shore of Plymouth, the landing of other pioneers; over the mountains presently the vanguard of those who broke the pathways to the West; then the swift and growing tide of settlement, until the continent was mastered and the land possessed from sea to sea—such in three hundred years has been the history of America; and we today possess the fruits of what the centuries have won. We remember now not only the timbered hills and the fertile valleys of our Atlantic seaboard, not only the fields and the orchards from which have come the harvests that lie as an oblation to God in Eastern churches today; but our thoughts sweeps further, over the blue mountains, to where the mighty wheat fields of the Middle West roll like a level sea, and on to the orange groves of California and the trees with their perpetual fruit. All these have the providence of God given to us. For all these must we be thankful to Him today.

But our thinking leads us further. Our gratitude to God on this Thanksgiving Day cannot center finally on the plenty of our land nor on any other kind of tangible possessions. For these we do thank Him—for ourselves and for the nation. But there is something higher. The heritage of America lies at last not in her wealth which is visible, but in that which is invisible. It lies, as with Israel, in the consciousness of a destiny to fulfil for God.

We turn again to our text and hear what Moses said to that people of God long ago. It was a great thing to have the prospect of possessing Canaan; but there was something greater. They had been taught, he said, the statutes of God, and these they were to obey. And out of these should come their glory. "This is your wisdom and understanding," he said, "in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes and say, surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there who hath God so nigh unto them as the Lord our God is in all things that we call upon Him for?"

What Moses said was sublimely true of Israel—then, and in all the changing years since. The glory of Israel never lay supremely in the kind of greatness which Egypt and Babylon boasted in. It was not the extent of her territory, nor any treasure amassed within her borders, that made her unique among the nations. Rather, it was the ideals she dared believe in and obey. It was her sense of the immense reality of God. The kingdoms of Judah long since have perished. Babylonia and Assyria broke down the walls of the sacred city and left them there a dusty ruin. Yet Israel in captivity, Israel finding her voice in Jeremiah and Ezekiel, was as great as the Israel of her imperial days. And when Rome had shattered the nation once again and flung the broken fragments of its life to the winds of all the world, it could not touch the elusive greatness of that people. Through the centuries since the ancient people of God have borne their indomitable witness to the faith they have clung to, and the influence of Israel upon the life of every people of our modern world is vaster than any historian can exhaust.

So in truth it is—and ought to be understood—in regard to our own country in the here and now. America's greatness rests at last not in the amplitude of her fields, nor in her gigantic manufactures, nor in all the exultant power of her imperial trade. These things are at their worst the clogs, and their best only the instrument, of the higher life. The real greatness of the nation is bound up with its ideals. It consists in the fact that it believes in a mission which a divine meaning has made great and that it trusts for its rank among the other peoples not to what it owns, but to what it is.

Surely as we look at the history of America it is beautiful to see how idealism has entered into it. This vast nation of ours did not grow up by chance. Neither did it spring from men who had nothing more than superficial ends to serve in founding it. From the beginning, both in Virginia and on the shore of Plymouth Bay, the men who laid the foundations for the coming vastness builded in the fear of God. What they sought to rear was not simply a dwelling for themselves, but the structure of a nation that should enshrine within itself the high freedom of human souls fashioning finer things than the old world in its society had ever known. The men of Jamestown and the men of Massachusetts equally believed that this nation should inherit no common destiny. And through the whole course of the nation's history there have always been those who at every crisis of her life have tried to guide her footsteps in the light of the far ideals.

The faith which we must hold is the high faith which Moses voiced long ago. It is the clear belief which he held up for Israel—that a nation's exaltation among the peoples depends upon the clearness with which its life expresses the guiding purposes of God.

When, therefore, we ask ourselves what is God's use for this nation's greatness, we ask it in the light of this conception of what the nation's greatness is. As that greatness is not material but spiritual, so God's highest use of us is to be interpreted in the same way. His highest use for us and His highest blessing would be to make us a light among the peoples—a beacon flaming with the splendor of a people's living faith in the supremacy of the soul above the flesh and of the power of God above the littleness of men.

In our international relationships we need a new faith in God. The gravest peril of this time to America is not the imagined possibility of an attack by possible foes. It is the poisoning of her spirit by unfaith and fear. We are tempted to forget God and to bear ourselves now as though all the brutal and destructive elements in the universe were permanently triumphant. Frightened voices tell us that the mad passions which have caused old wars are not chastened, but inflamed with a new and deadly ferocity. They cry to America to prepare for the deluge of the woes that will deepen with the coming years.

But there is need of another voice. It is the voice that tells America that the one clear way to greatness—yes, to a kind of unmatched spiritual grandeur which might make for the redeeming of a world that seems so deep accursed—lies along another path than that of fear. Her mighty opportunity now is in the chance for faith in God when faith is a heroic thing. The technical experts may determine the kind of ships and the kind of guns which are needed for efficiency under the strange conditions which modern war has developed, but not the technical experts with their necessary bias, but only the earnest conscience of the people must determine whether America shall allow her national policy and her soul's destiny to be settled by decisions forced upon us in hours of panic, or whether she shall wait with steady strength in the faith that the high example of her confidence may make it true that out of the last war the soul of the world must come purged of the madness of its heathenism and ready to listen to the counsels of a people that can speak to it of the salvation of our God.

And if we need a mightier faith in God, so also we need a mightier faith in man. The facts of the world today seem to mock that suggestion with a bitter cynicism. Has not all the best that we believed of men seemed to have broken down? We thought the nations were civilized; they seem to be plunging down the abyss of barbarism. We thought that reason and conscience would have combined to make impossible some of the atrocities the years have witnessed: yet men have committed them and boasted in them with a hideous exultation. How, then, can we trust in the human nature which has seemed to fail so grievously under its test?

Well, there are two kinds of human nature. There is the nature that is conformed to all the evil or undeveloped elements in our heritage. There is human nature judged according to what would be normal if we considered simply the raw material of the flesh and the savage instincts out of which sometimes the fabric of our nature seems to be made. But then, there is that other thought of human nature which considers it in the light of its ideal—the nature which, if not actually, is always ideally, ours, and to which the spirit in its noblest moments kindles in high response. It was this aspect of human nature which Jesus was always emphasizing. It was the consciousness of this to which He appealed. And it is this which we must magnify today.

There can be no short cut to the deliverance of the world from the recurrence of the kind of tragic shame into which it has been brought in the years of war. We shall not prevent war in the future by any mechanical means alone. We shall not prevent it by arbitration treaties nor Hague tribunals unless underneath there exists a far vaster and mightier force of which we shall in a moment speak. Still less shall we insure the world against war, or even assure our own nation against it by the fatuous imagination that great armaments somehow prevent it. They simply foment the temper that causes war, turning friendship into fear and filling peace with the coward's panic. The only thing that can redeem the world is the redemption of its spirit, and nothing less deep and searching than that can avail. Selfishness must be overcome by unselfishness, a narrow and mean covetousness widened into a nobler sympathy, and the jealous individualism which cares only for one's own good or the good of one's own nation lifted into the kind of human brotherhood which expresses the spirit of the Christ.

It would be a deep and wondrous cause for Thanksgiving if we in America could realize that. It would be a still deeper cause for Thanksgiving if we could set ourselves patiently to create here the spirit the world needs everywhere.

The spirit of nations is, in the long run, the spirit of the peoples, and the spirit of the peoples is determined by the spirit which individuals are creating day by day.

Therefore today must hearts be lifted up in a Thanksgiving which is an intercession, too. Thank God for all that He has given us—for peace, prosperity, for our deliverance from the dreadfulness of war! But thank Him most of all for the hope that the soul of this nation may be so filled with God that it shall help the race to commit its life anew to Him, and pray that we ourselves may light the way by the new consecration of our own souls!

CHURCH OF ENGLAND NEWS

Among the most notable recent events in the life of the Church of England has been the Birmingham Church Congress. The general impression is that it has been thoroughly successful as a source of inspiration to Church people. The following comment is made by one who is described as a none too sympathetic local critic: "Beneath the seething controversies implicit in the Congress papers and debates, and beyond the blare of press trumpets, there has been a quality about the Congress which defies analysis. There was in it a spirituality which informed and illumined everything said and done. From first to last this supernatural element ran through the proceedings as a vein of gold through a mass of quartz."

The Bishop of Birmingham has made an observation about the Congress which is worthy of consideration. "What the Congress got from casual speakers," he remarks, "was not of much service as a rule. People who got up in the enthusiasm of the moment had not much that was profitable to say." But for compensation there was an absence of the spirit of bitterness. "The one or two who seemed to be beating old drums found their instruments so flat that no sound worth giving came forth."

A constructive criticism of the Congress comes from the Rev. A. G. Lloyd, vicar of Harborne. He writes: "The prepared papers and speeches were generally excellent, though sometimes marred by lack of time; the impromptu discussion was, to say the least, futile. The subjects were far too numerous and the number of papers excessive, with the result that members of the Congress had no time to digest the matter, still less to contribute any comment or supplement worthy of the theme under discussion." Mr. Lloyd proceeds to make the following suggestions: "Let the program be confined to a few subjects which distinctly claim attention; let one, or at the most two, experts be invited to present prepared papers in collaboration with one another; let a precis of the papers be printed and be on sale to members only at least a month before the Congress meets. Then Church people from all parts, who have, or think they have, something to contribute to the common stock of knowledge and practical suggestion, would have time to think and be prepared when the time comes for discussion. It might be well for intending speakers to give notice of their intention before the meeting, so that the president, with or without consultation with the standing committee, might select representative contributors to the debate."

The Prayer Book and the Modern Spirit.

The Guardian comments editorially that "not the least interesting, or the least important, of the Church Congress discussions was that on 'Modification in the Services of the Church.' One of the changes urged by the Bishop of Chelmsford is the shortening of the principal offices, and it is notorious that great numbers of people, especially of the new generation, find our services too long. What appears to be undue length is accounted for partly by repetition and partly by unnecessarily elaborate music without which, we are forever being assured, choirs cannot be kept together. This assurance does not carry conviction; but when it is well founded we should perhaps be better without those choirs."

Dr. R. J. Campbell lamented the neglect into which preaching has, unhappily, fallen. To him it appears that "it is the dearth of preachers more than anything else that is keeping churches empty." The editor of the Guardian comments: "Without going quite so far as that, we are bound to recognize that, taken all round, Anglican preaching has reached a low ebb. Eloquent, persuasive, scholarly preachers we have—our 'pulpit' columns bear witness to it every week—but the average of parochial preaching is low. This is not altogether the fault of the clergy. They are not taught to preach, and least of all are they taught to preach extemporaneously. Too often they lack spontaneity and freshness, they are too closely tied down to texts, too much indebted to commentaries which save them the trouble of thinking—sometimes, indeed, the serving of tables leaves them little time to think. Even more than eloquence we need teaching power, a realization of the amazing ignorance of the laity, and the difficulty they experience in obtaining instruction in the history, so fascinating and romantic, of the Church and of religion generally."

The Modern Churchmen's Conference.

The English Church papers are still carrying correspondence on the pros and cons of the papers presented at the Modern Churchmen's Conference, held at Cambridge. In the Guardian of October 21 Dr. Hastings Rashdall, dean of Carlisle, defends his position against the general accusations of Mr. Champneys. "It is monstrous for Mr. Champneys to say," writes the dean, "as regards one who believes and is trying (however mistakingly) to persuade other people that a sense at once reasonable and orthodox can be given to the Creeds and other authoritative formulae about the Divinity of Christ, that 'he cannot help wondering what it feels like to be constantly repeating a set of statements in church . . . not only to deny them, but to persuade others that they are not true.' For my own part, I should like to know what Mr. Champneys feels like when he hears the Ninth Commandment read in church—to say nothing of the Epistle for Quinquagesima Sunday. Mr. Champneys is quite entitled to deny that the sense which I give to the words is a legitimate and orthodox interpretation of them; to deny that I sincerely think so is simply hitting below the belt."

The New Bishop of Bath and Wells.

The canonical election of Dr. Wynne Willson as Bishop of Bath and Wells took place last week in Wells Cathedral.

TEMPTATION.

Temptation is surely an assault to be withstood, but at the same time it is an opportunity to be seized. Viewed in this light, life becomes inspiring, not in spite but because of its struggles, and we are able to greet the unseen with a cheer, counting it unmixed joy when we fall into the many temptations which, varied in form, log our steps from the cradle to the grave. The soldier who is called to the front is stimulated, not depressed; the officer who is bidden by his general to a post of great responsibility, and so of hardship and peril, is thrilled with the joy of his task. An opportunity has been given him to prove himself worthy of great trust, which can be done only at the cost of great trouble. This is a true picture of temptation. And the result of it all is a nature invigorated and refined, a character made capable of close friendship with God, to say nothing of the unmeasured joy that is the attendant of nobility of soul and stalwart Christian manhood.—Bishop Brent.

A Thanksgiving Story

Why God gave me wealth, I know not; but He gave it and I used it for my own comfort. I built a dwelling which was the wonder and envy of the city; I clothed myself in shining raiment; I ate the choicest foods that money could buy; I surrounded myself with all that the physical man could ask for, and soon I was surfeited to a point where none of these things could give me pleasure, but where the absence of any one of them would give acutest pain. I was thankful then for nothing, but afraid of many things, of poverty, of hunger and cold.

God gave me health, and I spent it right royally. I drove my car faster than any man has a right to drive and swore at those who crossed my path. I filled my lungs to overflowing with the life-giving, frost-touched air as I climbed the hills and swung the brassie and irons, and I cursed in bitterness when a shot went a little wild. God gave me health, and I used it without stint, but I was not thankful for it. I was only afraid of the oncoming years with their inevitable decay and a seat by the fire where I could but tell the younger men of the exploits of my own unreturning youth.

God gave me a home; a wife who loved me with a love that I never quite understood; children who looked upon me with shining eyes as if I were a god. He gave me a home where I was surrounded by every blessing that could delight the heart of a man, and I forgot the ecstasy of the early married years and ceased to be thankful, and was afraid that the rising cost of food and little hats and coats and shoes would interfere with the pleasures on which I had set my heart.

And then—God gave me a friend who had neither wealth nor health nor home. While I was squandering my thousands in search of a passing thrill, he was saving his pennies for bread. While I labored and cursed on the golf course, he played and sang at his work. When, at eventide, I sulked in my home, he came to his little hall bedroom as an exiled king returning at last to his throne. And he thanked God for his daily bread; he thanked God for his job; he even thanked God for me, and the sweetest word in all his world was the one he used to describe his little hall bedroom. He called it "home."

And God in His mercy gave me this man for a friend, and through him I found a new meaning and saw a new glory in life. I would gladly have given him half of all that I had, but he was so much richer than I he would not accept it. Instead, he gave of himself in his wealth to me in my poverty, and I saw life at last through his eyes. My wealth became a sacred trust; my health a blessing, my home a little heaven on earth. I thank God now for these things which I had lost, but I thank Him most for the friend who helped me find them.

Middleton S. Barnwell.

The Soul Specialist

Larkin W. Glazebrook, M. D.

(Note: In reporting the following "history" of a patient, I feel I will be pardoned, when it is remembered that it is customary to report interesting cases in our professional medical journals.)

On a recent Sunday morning I attended service and had the privilege of listening to a splendid sermon by my rector from the text, "That ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth and length and depth and heighth, and to know the love of Christ" (Eph. 3:3).

Following up these thoughts, and to satisfy a recent desire to know more of this great man (is it not rather remarkable that so many of us, professing Christian men, are so ignorant of the life history and teachings of our Master; as compared with our desire to read and study the many biographies of other great men in history?), I spent several delightful hours that afternoon in reading "Jesus' Principles of Living," by Kent and Jenks.

The same evening it was my privilege to attend one of our large churches and there to hear a most remarkable and convincing message from the text, "He that observeth the wind shall not sow; and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap" (Eccles. 11:4).

This was the answer that the preacher gave to a young man recently, who saw nothing but ruin and failure in the world conditions. The splendid note of Christian optimism so forcibly and convincingly spoken by this clergyman sent me home convinced that Christ does all things with a purpose and that "all was well."

Hardly had I reached my home when I was called by an excited youth of fourteen years of age to come at once to see his mother, who had been taken suddenly very ill and was unconscious. I went with him and entered the sick room. A younger brother of seven was kneeling by the bed crying bitterly; a kindly neighbor was doing her best to render assistance. I found a woman about thirty years of age, apparently unconscious, lying on the bed. My attention was at once attracted to the general healthy appearance and "color" of the patient. Realizing that there was no immediate danger, I asked the friend to get the two boys to bed. I then noted a bottle of veronol lying on the table; I took the patient quietly by the hand, and, rousing her, asked why she had taken the medicine; her unconsciousness immediately disappeared and she promptly replied that her "faith had been broken," that she "had been deceived," that the man in whom she had placed absolute confidence had confessed to her that he was married and the father of a family, that being a woman of very strong religious faith she immediately turned to her Bible for help, she opened it at random and read the first verses that she found. "Then said the Lord unto me, though Moses and Samuel stood before me, yet my mind could not be toward this people; cast them out of my sight; such as are for death, to death: and such as for the sword, to the sword" (Jer. 15:1-2).

She then had fallen in a faint to the floor, and as she did so tore the leaf from the book. When she aroused her one thought was self-destruction, and with that she took the tablets in the bottle. Prompt medical relief was then given her, and after a short time she responded, but, unfortunately, was mentally hopeless and determined to "end all." I made a feeble effort to set her mind at rest. I assured her that there was hope in that Book, but that she had looked in the wrong part of it; that she should have turned to the New rather than the Old Testament; that God had found it necessary through His prophets to admonish and reprove His chosen people, but He had promised them a new hope if they would only follow His precepts. I then told her of the Man, Jesus Christ, and His one most constant plea, "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

In a short while she became composed and promised to do only what was right until my return. The following day I called and found her more composed, but still far from being satisfied. Realizing this, I determined to bring a doctor in consultation the next day. I went to see my dear friend, the Rev. Dr. ————, who had preached the sermon on optimism; I explained to him all that I knew of this new acquaintance and he agreed to go with me to see her. No awkwardness was occasioned when I introduced him as Dr. ————, a soul specialist. I noted that for the first time she smiled; I then left the room, and after his visit I went in to see her. The change was most marked; hope and faith had returned. My patient will recover.

I need go no further with this picture, but I feel I may draw a few conclusions.

How many professional men like myself have had numerous cases of this character and have been impressed with the long-drawn-out recoveries. "Neurasthenia," "nervous prostration," etc. In many of these cases the carefully drawn out "history" as to its cause brings to light the "skeleton in the closet"; and, alas, too often the public notoriety, so frequently noticed on the first page of our morning papers.

I feel that something must be done to salvage this frightful waste of human life.

I know that much can be done if the members of these two professions can get together; co-operate in giving relief to these, God's children.

I commend the above to the serious consideration of physicians and clergymen. That they may "know the love of Christ," "Who is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask."

LOVE.

Who shall say that in the Old Testament love is not more prominent than law? Of course, there is law, and the exhibit of the consequences of its violation, in the Old Testament, as again in the New; but in the Old Testament, as in the New, there is shown love as back of all law, as evidence in all law, and as promising redemption from the consequences of law violated by unloving man. * * *

Mere obedience to law could not save a man. God never taught that it could. Man never had reason to think that it could. Love was shown in God's laws; love prompted man to doing as the loving God wanted done; love trusted God beyond all sight and proof. In the Old Testament this was taught in precept and in promise. In the New Testament it was taught in fresh prominence and power, by the crowning evidence of God's love, and the addition of a new motive for man's recognition of it, in the gift of Jesus Christ as the Son of God and the Son of man, Sovereign and Saviour.—A. C. Trumbull.

ARMISTICE DAY IMPRESSIVELY CELEBRATED IN NEW YORK

President's Address at Arlington Heard by Large Crowds in Madison Square Garden: Death of the Rev. Dr. Peters

Armistice Day, and the Sundays before and after it, had marked effect upon New York. Fancy a city, millions of people, stopping in all its activities, every train, every wheel, almost every person, and quite still for the space of two minutes. This occurred on November 11. With it was also the address from President Harding, and the entire exercises at Arlington, where the Unknown American was buried. Madison Square Garden, with 15,000 people within it, was a vast cathedral. The religious fervor was extreme and yet not histerical. It was natural. When Arlington sang hymns New York joined in and was able to keep almost exact unison. Such things, it is safe to say, never were possible before.

Next to this in remarkable importance was the fact that 10,000 people packed into the northeastern corner of Madison Square, were able to hear distinctly the address of President Harding, and all of the exercises at Arlington. The open air seemed to make no difference, and these people were not only deeply affected, but were able to join in the hymns.

Trinity Church, historic St Paul's Chapel, a score of other churches of all bodies, and the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, all these were crowded. The Cathedral was never so packed. Nothing even like standing room but had an occupant.

Bishop Manning presided and the Rt. Rev. Arthur S. Lloyd, Suffragan Bishop, preached. The full Cathedral choir sang the special service prepared by Bishop Manning, and the congregation joined in the hymns.

Bishop Manning addressed a special welcome to the scores of school children and expressed the hope that Armistice Day, 1921, might ever be remembered as "the beginning of a new era of brotherhood and peace." Following the two-minute silence, the Bishop prayed that "light perpetual" might shine upon those who had died for their country, and concluded with a prayer for the Washington conference.

Bishop Lloyd said there was one aspect of the situation at Washington which boded no good.

"And that," he said, "is the atmosphere of mutual distrust that has long played so potent a part in keeping the nations of the world from getting together on a basis of reason and brotherhood."

Twelve hundred persons were crowded into Trinity Church and scores had been turned away when the services began, and until 12 o'clock Trinity's bells tolled every thirty seconds. Then for two minutes came a tearful silence, while a multitude knelt before a crepe-draped American flag in reverence to its dead. Memorial services here were conducted by the Rev. Henry P. Veazie, assisted by the Rev. Frederick W. Goodwin, and after the congregation had filed slowly out many persons lingered in the yard to decorate some ancient grave. The tomb of Alexander Hamilton bore a large wreath of white chrysanthemums.

Just a few blocks further up Broadway, in the church where George Washington was wont to pray, a crowd filled St. Paul's Chapel, the oldest house of worship on Manhattan. Here, too, the ancient bell was tolled every thirty seconds, and here, too, the congregation knelt before the nation's black-draped flag. The Rev. Dr. William Montague Geer, vicar emeritus, read the gospel lesson, and the Rev. Dr. Joseph P. McComas, the vicar, preached the sermon.

In Brooklyn a union service was held in Holy Trinity Church, crowds filling it. The speakers were military men.

Columbia University crowded its students into St. Paul's Chapel, where the Rev. C. F. Kennedy, acting chaplain, conducted services. Mr. Kennedy has been rector of Holy Nativity Parish, Bronx. College leaders made the addresses.

At night in Madison Square Garden the Central Trades and Labor Council held a mass meeting. A new Roman Bishop was one speaker and Bishop Manning another.

"There are three reasons," Bishop Manning said, "why we believe that the Disarmament Conference assembling in Washington can accomplish something real and definite in this great cause.

"We believe this because the aim with which the conference meets is simple, clear and practical. In the present state of the world and of human nature complete disarmament is not possible. So long as there is wickedness and lawlessness in this world we shall need armies and navies as police, to maintain law and to uphold justice and right. But if all will agree to this, a great limitation and reduction of our present armaments is possible. If all the nations sincerely want this we can take this great step immediately. And if there is any nation that does not sincerely want this, that nation deserves to be treated as an alien and an outlaw.

"We believe that this conference must do something actual and definite, because if something is not now done, disaster and ruin are at our doors.

"The world cannot longer endure its present burdens. The economic pressure of these burdens, if continued, will inevitably bring more wars upon us. And it is agreed by all that another war such as that through which we have just passed would mean the wreck of the whole civilized world.

"We believe that it is possible for this conference to do something real and definite, because we know that this is right, and nothing that is right is impossible. The principles of right dealing between nations are the same as those between individuals. There will always be place for the distinctive life of each nation, as there will always be place for the distinctive life of each family. There will always be place for a high and noble patriotism and love of one's own country."

The Cathedral at night was again filled in every part. Dean Robbins presided, and Bishop Manning spoke briefly, leaving to go to Madison Square. Dr. John H. Finley also spoke, but the striking address was made by the Rev. Dr. John Kelman, pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, who was in the Far East this past summer, and who has lately, in his own church, spoken strongly in favor of fair treatment for Japan and China.

"In Japan and China we have made the blunder sometimes of trying to Westernize the East," said Dr. Kelman. "Remember, if we approach the East in such a spirit there lies in front of us the inevitable conflict of the white and yellow peril! For God's sake let us be careful. May we—the two races—move down the ages as brethren.

"Japan is a very noble nation—a nation whose value to the world is incomputable. At the present hour she is needing expansion, and in that she is not unlike some European nations.

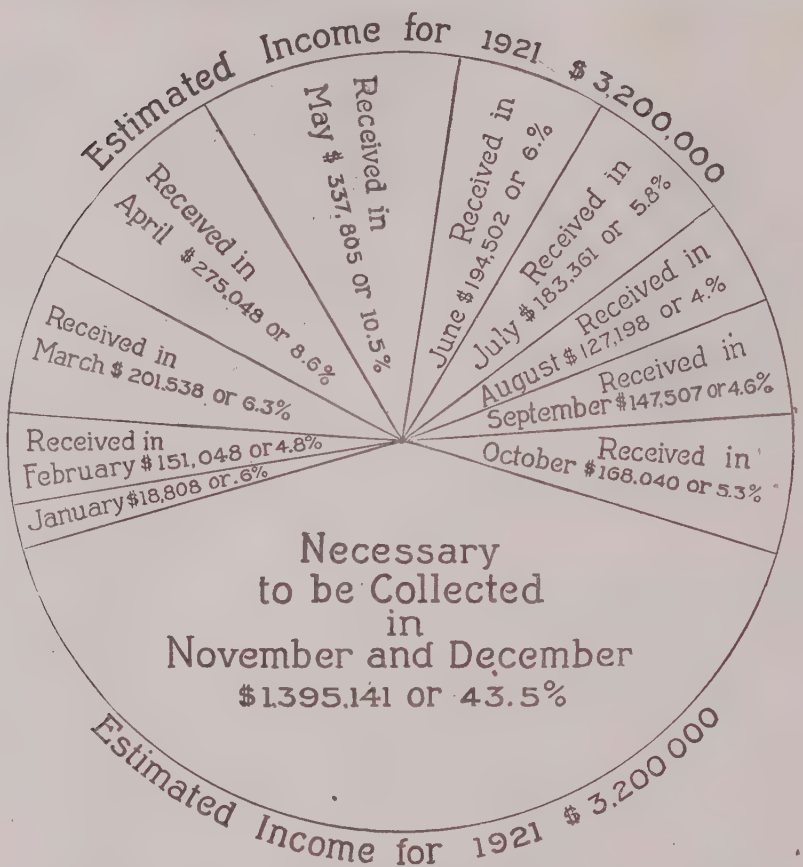
"She is looking about and questioning why these things are for other nations and not for her.

"I believe that the heart of Japan will not consider war with America. I shall take my courage in both hands and say more. If only one nation would take a strong lead in this line, other nations would follow in peace.

"China is crushed by the graft of rulers. Her republic is impossible under existing conditions. Young China is rising and growing. She needs time and help to get upon her feet. All may agree that some guarantee should be provided in the meantime for the safety of the Chinese nation.

"China is today the supreme temptation of the world. Among the reasons for this are her cheap labor and her raw material. It is but reasonable there should be some strong protectorate of international defense for China until she can get hold of herself sufficiently."

The death is announced of the Rev. Dr. John P. Peters, professor in the University of the South, former rector of St. Michael's Parish, New York, but known far beyond these services as an archaeologist, and leader in discoveries in the Near East, especially at Nippur. He died in the Presbyterian Hospital here, aged sixty-nine. He was a Yale man, and had studied at and been honored by the Universities of Berlin and Leipzig. For a time he was in charge of a church at Dresden. He served in the Philadelphia School and the University of Pennsylvania, and succeeded the Rev. Dr. Thomas P. Peters as rector of St. Michael's. While there he was a leader in civic work in New York, an active servant of public reforms, a worker in an association of advance labor. He was a writer of many books and articles in research lines. He was in charge of the University of Pennsylvania expedition to Babylon, and for six years was a canon of the New York Cathedral.



Speaking editorially, the New York Tribune said:

"As churchman, scholar and citizen, he nobly served his day and generation, and he left a record and a legacy of achievement to be cherished with gratitude. His life seems a sufficient answer to those who hold that the Christian ministry is decadent."

HEARTRENDING PLEA FOR THE CHRISTIANS IN TURKEY.

Copy of Cablegram.

Oecumenical Patriarchate.

General Secretariat of the Society of Nations, Geneva:

Since the conclusion of the armistice the Oecumenical Patriarchate has not ceased to denounce to the great powers and to the free peoples the atrocities to which the Christian population submitted (placed under the yoke of) Turkey have suffered during and after the war. It has in vain called for help and relief of these unfortunates. The threats, the deportations, the confiscations continue. On the littoral of the Black Sea, the former prosperous localities such as Kerassunde, Bafra, Samsoun and others of which the protection nevertheless was easy, are depopulated to the point that there remain only women and children who tomorrow may be exterminated in their turn.

That it should not be thought that we are exaggerating the gravity of the situation, we bring here the acknowledgement of the Turks themselves. The Turkish newspapers Ehal and Hilal, of Samsoun, in their numbers (issues) of the 18th, 19th and 27th of September, published lists containing the names of three Armenians and one hundred and sixty-eight Greeks, of which two were Protestant Greeks, one a missionary, the other a professor of the American College of Mersifoun, who had been condemned to death. With the exception of seventeen, including the Archbishop of Amassis, absent, and condemned by default, all the others were executed. All the nobles and prelates of the religion are counted amongst the victims. In bringing these new crimes to the knowledge of the Society of Nations, the Oecumenical Patriarchate ventures to hope that it will urgently decree measures which will put an end to this state of things, so contrary to the humanitarian aims that it upholds and the high institution from whom the oppressed await the alleviation of their misery, will not fail to solemnly manifest its indignation for such barbarous acts following a war, which should be the last.

The Locum Tenens of the Oecumenical Patriarchate,
NICOLAS, Archbishop of Cesarea.

Translation of Letter.

Rt. Rev. Bishop of Harrisburg, Dear and Beloved Brother in Christ, Mr. J. Darlington, the Grace of God the Father and Our Lord Jesus Christ Be With You:

As a consequence of the continuous dreadful and abominable acts of the Turkish administration against the Christian population of Anatolia, the Oecumenical Patriarchate, in deep sorrow for this horrible tragedy, thought its duty to send a cablegram to the League of Nations urging its intervention and the adoption of hasty measures for the salvation of the remaining Christian population of Anatolia.

We enclose your lordship a copy of the cablegram in order to acquaint yourself with the situation, and by a resolution of the Holy Synod we request you not to fail to lift up your brotherly voice in behalf of the oppressed and slaughtered Christians of Anatolia.

It is exceedingly afflicting and entirely inconceivable that even today there is permitted by the civilized world the continuation with immunity of such nefarious crimes in the unfortunate Anatolia by the unfit present administration.

Thanking you in anticipation for the assistance of your lordship and that of your pious congregations, we embrace you brotherly in Christ, and we remain with affection and honor.

Of your lordship,
Dear brother in Christ,
The Locum Tenens of the Oecumenical Patriarchate,
NICOLAS, Archbishop of Cesaria.

Philadelphia Divinity School Lays Cornerstone of New Building.

The cornerstone of the Library Building of the Philadelphia Divinity School was laid on Monday afternoon, November 7. On its old property (sold four years ago) a library building had been erected in memory of William Bacon Stevens, fourth Bishop of Pennsylvania, one of the founders of the school, one of its first overseers, and one also of its first instructors. The new building will perpetuate this memorial, being known as the William Bacon Stevens Library. This is the first unit to be erected in the group of fine buildings that will ultimately stand upon the superb new site acquired by the school at Forty-second and Spruce Streets. The building will be used, pending the erection of further units, for chapel as well as library. Its lower floors will contain class-rooms and refectory and kitchen. The cornerstone was laid by Bishop Rhinelander, Bishop Garland and Dean Bartlett assisting in the service.

The Divinity School and its many friends have been working steadily for some years over plans for its rebuilding and re-equipment, on a site very near the University of Pennsylvania, with which institution it has close relations of mutual benefit. Five years ago the land was acquired—a whole city block, with marked variations of grade and covered with fine old trees. Grade and trees alike present a remarkable problem and opportunity, which the architects, Messrs. Zantzinger, Borie and Medary, have made the most of; as the very interesting model of the whole proposed group clearly shows. Out of some one hundred fine trees, all but three will be undisturbed. Four years ago the school accepted a very advantageous offer for its old site and buildings, and has since carried on its work, though with great inconvenience and with severely limited accommodations, in rented houses in the centre of the city. Three years ago the competition for architectural plans was held. Actual building, however, was not undertaken until this autumn, when prices became somewhat more nearly normal. The plans provide for the ultimate housing of at least one hundred and fifty students; but their design is such as to admit readily of construction unit by unit, as funds permit and the needs of the school demand.

Clergymen's Retiring Fund Society.

The directors of the Clergymen's Retiring Fund Society met at the Church Missions House November 11. The reports presented showed that the principal fund safely invested now amounts to $430,338.84, that the three hundred annuitants will receive $27,250.50 divided among them within a few days, and that the "valuation" balance sheet prepared by an actuary of the Mutual Life Insurance Company, after a thorough examination of the society's affairs, shows that the assets of the society are sufficient to meet all its obligations, present and prospective, to its members with a margin of $62,236.84 to spare.

Conferences for alumni and other clergy are being held at the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass., as follows:

Subject, Some of the Great Mystics; leader, the Rev. Charles Morris Addison, D. D.; on alternate Mondays at 3 P. M. at 28 Hubbard Park, Cambridge.

Subject, Buddhism; leader, the Rev. Professor James Thayer Addison; on alternate Mondays at 3 P. M. at 136 Brattle Street, Cambridge.

Subject, Christian Biography: George Fox, John Wesley, Cardinal Manning, Stopford Brooke; leader, the Rev. William Wood; on alternate Mondays at 3 P. M. at the Deanery, 3 Mason Street, Cambridge.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Mass Meeting in City Auditorium.

A splendid congregation of several thousand people filling the Richmond City Auditorium greeted Dr. James E. Freeman, of Epiphany Church, Washington, on Sunday night, November 13.

The service was under the auspices of the Nation-Wide Campaign Committee of the Diocese, and included members of all of the city churches, which were closed for that evening.

The combined choirs of the churches were present in their vestments, and the processional was a truly inspiring sight.

The Creed and Lord's Prayer was led by Dr. J. J. Gravatt, President of the Richmond Clericus. Rev. P. A. Arthur read the Lesson, and Dr. Bowie introduced the speaker of the evening in a few well-chosen words.

Dr. Freeman spoke eloquently of the great world crisis as typified in the assembling of the international conference at Washington, and brought out forcefully the importance of the Church in general and the Diocese of Virginia in particular, maintaining its efficiency at this time by continuing to meet its obligation in the Nation-Wide Campaign.

Bishop Brown pronounced the benediction and had charge of the service.

Annual Meeting of the Junior Auxiliary.

The Junior Auxiliary of the Diocese of Virginia held its annual meeting November 2 in Monumental Church, Richmond, with a remarkably good attendance. The leaders' meeting in the morning was exceedingly helpful as well as interesting. Quite a number of out-of-town branches sent delegates and the reports were most encouraging. Miss Anna Purcell spoke on the Thank Offering, and Mrs. Butler, of Boyce, gave many practical suggestions illustrating her talk with the sand table and with simple articles made by her Juniors. Mrs. Barton presided at this meeting, as well as at the mass meeting in the church, which took place in the afternoon. The motto chosen for the Juniors this year is, "Keep Up the Standards," which is a fitting reminder at this time, when the standards of right living are not being kept pure and bright and high before the eyes of many, but are lowered to suit our own convenience and pleasure.

The afternoon program consisted of a hymn, a few prayers, a welcome by the Rev. George P. Mayo, rector of the church; a welcome by Miss Elizabeth Thomas, leader of Monumental Juniors; annual report from the Diocesan Secretary, Mrs. R. T. Barton; Treasurer's report from Mrs. Herbert D. Larrick; report from the Juniors at Blue Ridge Industrial School by Miss Sipe, one of the girls; a talk on the "Gift of Life," by Miss Catherine Miller, and a talk by Mrs. Lloyd Craighill, of China. The offering (which amounted to over $50) was for the tuition of two Japanese girls, Toki and Kyo, and while it was being taken a small Junior from Holy Comforter in Japanese costume sang an appropriate solo. After another hymn and the benediction the annual Junior meeting was over, but the help and inspiration will long remain.

Sunday School Institute.

At the regular monthly business meeting of the Norfolk Clericus, held in St. Paul's Parish House November 7, plans and a program were adopted for holding a Church (Sunday) School Institute at St. Paul's Parish House December 12 to 15 inclusive. Dr. D. W. Howard was elected dean of the institute, and Rev. J. S. Meredith, the Rev. C. H. Holmead and Dr. W. A. Brown, Steering Committee. Dr. F. C. Steinmetz, of Norfolk; Dr. E. P. Dandridge, of Petersburg; the Rev. E. R. Carter, of Hampton, and the Rev. C. H. Holmead, of Portsmouth, are among those asked to speak. The institute is provided for the teachers and officers of all the Sunday schools of the Episcopal churches of Norfolk and Portsmouth.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

The Rev. Robert C. Jett D. D. Bishop

The congregation of St. Andrew's Church, Clifton Forge, the Rev. C. W. Sydnor, rector, has a movement on foot looking to the erection of a parish house adjoining the church. Plans are well under way, and it is hoped that this structure, the need of which has been felt for a long time past, will soon be an accomplished fact. It will undoubtedly be a very great help in the work of St. Andrew's.

The Executive Board passed a resolution designating that offerings to be given to the Centennial Fund in this Diocese should be applied to the work of the Rev. Lloyd R. Craighill at Nanchang, China. The Rev. Mr. Craighill, who is just now spending some time in this country, is a native of Lynchburg, in this Diocese, and in addresses at various points in this part of the State has aroused a great deal of interest in his work. The Board's Sub-Committee on Religious Education has outlined a splendid program for its future work. This includes a continued support of the Tri-Diocesan Summer School at Charlottesville for Church workers and Church school teachers; the establishment of a Diocesan Summer School less technical in its character for junior workers and students; the development of a systematic method of keeping in touch with young men and women connected with our church, while attending schools and colleges both within and without our Diocese.

Amherst Parish: Bishop Jett visited St. Luke's, Pedlar Mills, on Sunday, November 6, and confirmed a class of three. Others were to have been confirmed, but were kept away by the unusual difficulties of a country parish. The last visitation before this was by Bishop Whittle in 1891—just thirty years ago. The rectory has been remodeled and renovated, and, with the newly painted church, situated a short distance from the macadam road in a grassy lawn, presents a most attractive appearance. When the present rector, Rev. Josiah R. Ellis, took charge of St. Luke's, there was one resident member of the church. There are now about eleven members, and the prospect for future growth and usefulness of this church is full of encouragement. The Rev. Mr. Ellis, who has been holding occasional services at Christ Church, Schuyler, has given up that work for the present and will give one Sunday each month to Trinity Church, Boonsboro, which was one of the charges made vacant by the death of the Rev. Mr. Howell.

The Rev. William B. Lee, Sr., of Gloucester, spent two months this summer with his son, the Rev. W. B. Lee, Jr., who is rector of Christ Church, Blacksburg. During this time Mr. Lee, Sr., developed a great deal of interest in the mission work and rendered splendid assistance to the rector. As a result of his interest and efforts the Bishop, on the closing day of New River Convocation, confirmed a class at High Top (Merrimac Mines). At its meeting in October the Executive Board went on record as expressing its heartfelt appreciation of this unselfish service on the part of Mr. Lee.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Death of the Rev. W. R. Bushby.

The Rev. William R. Bushby, rector of St. Philip's Church, Laurel, Md., died suddenly at his home early in the morning of November 15. The Rev. Mr. Bushby had been connected with the Diocese of Washington since 1901, having served at St. Stephen's, St. Columbia's and Grace and St. John's Church, Georgetown. In 1914 he became rector of St. Philip's at Laurel. Mr. Bushby was born in Alexandria, Va., and received his higher education at Columbia University, where he was graduated in 1882. He was ordained deacon in 1901 and to the priesthood in 1907. Funeral services, conducted by the Bishop of Washington, were held at St. Philip's Church, Laurel, on Monday, November 14.

An all-day conference at Trinity Church, Upper Marlboro, for the parishes in Prince George's, St. Mary's and Charles Counties, was recently held in the interest of the Nation-Wide Campaign. At this conference the Bishop of Washington addressed the people. Other addresses were given by the Rev. John Riggs and the Rev. Charles E. Crusoe on the subjects, "What the Church Is For" and "What the Church Can Do." Affairs of the parishes in outlying districts are likely to be forgotten in the multiplicity of city interests, and it is well to be reminded that these country parishes are most active and in close co-operation with the larger interests of the Diocese.

St. Alban's Church has just ended an intensive drive of ten days for a large fund to be used for the completion of the church building, including chancel and west end with tower and and vestry room on the south side. This fund will be further used to clear the parish of all debt. The sum originally set as the goal was $65,000, and on the closing night of the campaign $47,000 had been given in pledges and cash. Of this, one gift of $12,000, four of $1,000 and six of $500 were the only large gifts. The remaining amount was given in sums from 50 cents to $100. Everybody in the parish and many friends outside responded enthusiastically and made the success of the drive possible. Mr. B. A. Bowles was chairman of the undertaking, and had under his direction twenty-five teams. Though the intensive part of the campaign is over, the workers will in a quiet way continue their efforts, and it is their conviction that the full amount will be raised.

At St. John's Church, during the vacancy in the rectorship caused by the resignation of Dr. Roland Cotton Smith, well-known clergymen from other cities are preaching at the Sunday morning services. On November 6 the Rev. Ashton Oldham, of St. Anne's Church, Brooklyn, preached the sermon, and those filling this place on Sundays, November 13 and 20, respectively, are the Rev. Dr. Charles L. Slattery, of Grace Church, New York, and the Rev. Dr. Hugh Birkhead, of Baltimore.

The Rev. Dr. Samuel McComb, canon of Maryland, delivered the principal address at the November meeting of the Sunday School Institute of the Diocese of Washington in Epiphany Parish Hall. His subject was "Aspects of Prayer." Miss Mary A. Wilbur, of the National Cathedral School for Girls, spoke on "Sunday School and Civics, With Special Reference to Teacher Training for Course 14 in the Christian Nurture Series."

Noon-day services in connection with the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments, were held every day at Epiphany Church during the week of November 14, the speakers including the Rev. Dr. Charles Steck, William Jennings Bryan, the Rev. Dr. W. S. Abernethy, the Rev. Dr. Jason Noble Pierce and Senator William E Borah, of Idaho.

The Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, D. D., was the special preacher at the Washington Cathedral on Sunday afternoon, November 13, and at Epiphany Church at the 8 o'clock service.

Educational Conferences.

Religious Education has been greatly stimulated in the Diocese through a series of conferences held by the Rev. Gardner L. Tucker, D. D., field secretary of the Province of Sewanee. and two members of the Provincial Board of Education, the Rev. W. A. Jonnard and Miss Mabel Lee Cooper, who visited Savannah, Augusta, Thomasville and Albany. In Savannah the conferences were held just before and at the time of the Synod. They began Sunday afternoon, October 23, when Dr. Tucker gave a background for what was to follow by speaking on "Christian Nurture" and "The Church's New Program." Mr. Jonnard's conferences were on "The Church School Service League" and "Work for Young People." Miss Cooper was scheduled to give only one conference, on "Work and Preparation of Teachers," but so enthusiastic were those who heard her Monday afternoon that she gave three extra lectures, attended by thirty-five or forty teachers from the four parishes. About eighty officers and teachers attended Dr. Tucker's lecture. Mr. Jonnard gave special conferences to the principal and supervisors of Christ Church School which has revised its organization somewhat under the guidance of Mr. Jonnard, who advised several changes possible under the remodeling of the splendid plant now owned by this parish.

Memorials and Gifts: On All Saints' Day the rector of Christ Church, Savannah, Ga., the Rev. John D. Wing, D. D., dedicated two seven branch candlesticks given by the Altar Guild in memory of those members who have gone beyond. On the twenty-fourth Sunday after Trinity, at the Church School Centennial celebration of this same parish, the rector dedicated a pair of Eucharistic candlesticks, given by Mrs. H. D. Pollard, in memory of her little son, Jack, who was a pupil of the school. The candlesticks are for the altar of the chapel of the remodeled Sunday school.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop

Two special services were held in Harrisburg on the eve of All Saints', one in St. Stephen's and the other in the Church of the Holy Cross (colored). The rector of St. Stephens', the Rev. R. A. Sawyer; the rector of Christ Church, Lykems, the Rev. E. L. B. Robinson; the Executive Secretary of the Diocese, the Rev. A. M. Judd, and Bishop Darlington were present at St. Stephen's. The Bishop and the Executive Secretary made addresses to further the interests of the Nation-Wide Campaign. At the Church of the Holy Cross, besides the rector, the Rev. W. M. Parchment, the Rev. Mr. Baker and Miss Watts were present and made addresses. The meeting had a two-fold object; first, to consolidate the incipient organization of a branch of the Woman's Auxiliary in the parish, and next to take the final steps toward completing the chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. At the close of the service in the church the women, led by Miss Watts, held a conference as to the object and work of the Woman's Auxiliary, and the men, with Mr. Baker, made final arrangements for installing a chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

Ten splendid men have banded themselves together for Brotherhood work, and are undertaking it in the best of spirit.

Refreshments were served at the close of the conferences.

Community Meetings: Including St. John's Church, the Rev. Alan Pressley Wilson, rector, all the Protestant churches in Marietta united in a Christian, patriotic community meeting on Sunday evening, November 6, for the purpose of praying for the righteous success of the Conference for the Limitation of Armament.

Since the month of July of this year, when every Sunday evening was given over to a community meeting, with each church and each pastor taking turns in conducting the union service, the general sentiment in the town has been largely in favor of these meetings. The Episcopal Church, under Mr. Wilson's pastorate, has taken quite an interest in these fellowship services, and it has been suggested that they be held once a month through the winter.

New Building Opened.

A largely attended reception was held recently at the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville, the Rev. M. R. Worsham, rector, formally opening the new chapel, parish house, gymnasium, etc., just completed.

The new building is three stories in height, red brick with a limestone trimming. On the first floor are the chapel, Women's Guild room, kitchens, offices of the building, gymnasium and pool. The pool, one of the finest in the South, was given by Mrs. A. G. Cummer, in memory of a number of her deceased relatives. The second floor includes the Men's Club rooms, study of the pastor, library, women's dressing room and the balconies of the chapel and gymnasium. The third floor is for the boys, with a reading room, amusement room and otherwise nicely equipped.

The "Ohio River District" Celebrates "Bishop's Day."

"Bishop's Day" for that part of the Diocese known as the Ohio River District was celebrated in Trinity Church, Covington, on November 8, when the Bishop and members of the Woman's Auxiliary in that part of the Diocese were entertained by the Trinity Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, assisted by the Rector's Aid.

Among the guests were the diocesan president of the Woman's Auxiliary, Mrs. J. R. Cowan, of Danville, and the clergy and members of the Woman's Auxiliary from each branch

PASTORING.

Away back in the book of Jeremiah there are some words which have a very solemn sound, and read like this, "Woe be unto the pastors that destroy and scatter the sheep of My pasture, saith the Lord."

Probably the laymen (or more generally laywomen) who read this passage think of the awfulness of the vows of the priesthood, and weight of the responsibility which rests upon those who assume them.

No doubt such persons would be surprised, perhaps even shocked, at the suggestion that this verse applies to the average member of the congregation, either male or female.

Nevertheless, this is true, for when we come to think of it, and it is well for us to think of it occasionally at least, by the development of modern civilization along with the express teaching of Christ, we are all pastors of one sort or another.

In these days of reaching out across oceans and continents to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, there is no one who is not the pastor of somebody elsewhere.

Pastoring is one of the obligations that has come with the drawing together of the world.

There was a time when if some man and wife away in the lower section of your city had a large family of children, and work failed and the man lost his job and the family began to suffer, it was no concern of yours, and you need not have it in your heart or mind. That day has passed along with stage coaches and horse cars.

The private individual can no longer shirk his or her responsibility as a pastor in some capacity.

There is a thought in this connection, however, which does not often seem to have "got through" to Church people, and that is the extent to which we are pastors to our pastors.

That sounds rather anomolous, doesn't it?

Nevertheless, it is a truth as well as an anomoly.

The effectiveness of a minister's work in his parish depends very largely upon the co-operation, the sympathy and support that he receives from his congregation.

This is more true, too, in connection with night service than with any other feature of the work of the average Episcopal Church.

Nothing is more difficult or disheartening than to try to preach an interesting and inspiring sermon to a little group of people scattered about in a large church.

Make a real effort to get out for the night service, for what you can do for your rector, as well as for what he may have to give you.

We knew a little girl once who had the right idea on this subject. She was only four years old, but insisted on going to church every Sunday night, although she invariably went sound asleep during the service, and was usually too sleepy to walk home and had to be carried.

Finally her father remonstrated. "Why do you make such a fuss about going to church at night, Ethel," he argued, "when you know you always go to sleep?"

"I know I do, Daddy," she replied, "but I know Mr. —— (the rector) likes to see me there on Sunday night."

That may not sound like a very good reason for going to church at night, but it is a better one than you might think, because your presence at the night service not only pleases the rector, but it helps him, not only with the Sunday night sermon, but with all his other work, to know that he has the interest and backing of his people.

Another thing that would help the rector would be for those who are at church Sunday night to occupy front seats on the pulpit side of the church.

Of course these suggestions are only meant for those churches that have a struggle to get out a 50 per cent. congregation on Sunday night.

There are some places where this is not the case, but the attendance at the night service is notoriously poor at Episcopal churches throughout the country.

DONATION DAYS.

This is the season when one institution after another comes before the public for funds with "tag days" or "donation days" or some other device for persuading the public to give.

If work of this sort could be reduced to the efficient basis everywhere, the burden of giving would not fall so heavily on the few, and the amount raised would be very much larger.

Until such a plan can be adopted each institution will have to appeal on its own merits and in its own way.

One form of institution that has always a strong appeal are the Homes for Incurables, which in many States are supported by private charity, and so have to make their annual request for funds.

When demands of every nature are so frequent, the only consolation that the person of moderate means can have is that "many a mickle makes a muckle."

If all will give a little for each call it will enable these worthy causes to keep going.

A special drive is in progress now for Ivakota Farm, in Fairfax County, Va., which is a branch of the Florence Crittenden Homes.

An endowment of $150,000 is contingent upon the erection of proper buildings on the farm.

There are now 113 girls in this institution, whose equipment is very primitive.

They need $25,000 to comply with the requirements for the endowment, and those who feel like contributing can send checks to Julian Hill, Esq., State and City Bank, Richmond, Va. Girls are taken at this institution from all over the State of Virginia and from the District of Columbia.

SHALL RED CROSS SERVICE CONTINUE

It has been said that a church accomplishes more when it is running behind its income. If this applies to other organizations, then the American Red Cross should accomplish more today than it ever has before. For while it took in last eyar in dollar membership dues $6,000,000, it spent in its service to the disabled soldiers $10,000,000.

Of course this is not true, or at least only true in a limited degree. For no organization can go on living beyond its income indefinitely. And so with the Red Cross. If its work is to go on, if it is to continue to serve the sick and suffering, wherever they are found, as it has in the past, its membership must be increased.

The Red Cross will hold its fifth annual roll call during the two weeks from Armistice Day, November 11, to Thanksgiving, November 24. The roll call is not a campaign. It is simply the opportunity for members to pay their yearly dollar membership dues, and for non-members to join. If you joined last year, don't rest satisfied with that. Your dollar has been spent, has bought medicine for some destitute little war orphan in Hungary, has taught some mother how to care for her baby, has helped some disabled ex-service man to while away a long, grey, monotonous day in the hospital. Knowing the need, what can you do but join?

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

in that part of the Diocese with the exception of Ashland, while the four guests of honor were Bishop Burton, to whom the day is annually dedicated, the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Ramsaur, of the Liberian mission staff, who have been in this country on furlough for the past few months, and Miss Martina Gordon, of Frankfort, who has completed her five years of training at the Deaconess House and the Pennsylvania Hospital in Philadelphia, and who expects to sail on December 3 with Mr. and Mrs. Ramsaur and Bishop and Mrs. Overs to join the Liberian mission staff at Cape Mount, Liberia, and who is the first life gift to the mission field from the Diocese of Lexington.

The day's program opened with a celebration of the Holy Communion at 10:30, at which the Bishop was the celebrant, assisted by the rector of Trinity, the Rev. James D. Gibson. Following this service, Bishop Burton gave as his address to the members of the Auxiliary a brief summing up on what had been done during the twenty-five years of his work as Bishop of Lexington, and calling upon the Woman's Auxiliary to lead in the next great advance which he planned for the Diocese, namely, a missionary for that part of the Diocese reached by the C. & O. Railway, to be known as the "C. & O. Missionary," corresponding to the work that the Rev. Mr. Clopton is doing as "L. & N. Missionary."

Luncheon was served in the Sunday school room, at which time those present were the guests jointly of the Woman's Auxiliary and the Rector's Aid. As the day was a combined celebration of the Bishop's birthday and also the close of the year that marked the completion of twenty-five years as bishop, the cake in the centre of the table was surrounded by twenty-six candles (one for the promise of the future). The large cake, with a map of the Diocese of Lexington on the top, was cut by the Bishop, with the assistance of Mrs. Gibson, the wife of Trinity's new rector, and even though Mr. and Mrs. Gibson were in a way the host and hostess of the occasion, it is so great a joy to Trinity to have them that it was felt that they, too, should have a place among the guests of honor. Following the luncheon a few words of greeting were spoken by the Bishop, Miss Scudder and Mr. Gibson, the Doxology was sung, and the Benediction pronounced by the Bishop.

The afternoon was given over to the work of our African mission, with addresses by the Rev. Mr. Ramsaur and Mrs. Ramsaur.

The afternoon closed with the introduction to the Woman's Auxiliary and their friends of Miss Gordon, who thanked the Auxiliary for having stood by her in her time of preparation for service and asking for prayers and help as she goes out to those who so need her in Africa.

ALABAMA

Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary.

The thirty-third annual convention of the Woman's Auxiliary in the Diocese met in the Church of the Advent, Birmingham, November 1-3.

On the first evening of the convention the pageant, "The Mission of the Church," was presented by all the Episcopal churches of Birmingham jointly. More than a hundred persons were in the caste and more than a thousand in the congregation. The presentation was most impressive.

On the second evening of the convention Bishop Mikell, of Atlanta, was the preacher at an inspiring and beautiful missionary service. Other speakers at meetings of the convention were the Rev. Oscar deW. Randolph, the Rev. Joseph T. Ware, the Rev. M. S. Barnwell, and Miss Blacknall, a missionary home on leave from St. Mark's, Nenana, Alaska.

The convention, which was the largest attended and most enthusiastic in the history of the diocesan "Auxiliary," was the culmination of the exceptionally effective work of Mrs. Charles Henderson, wife of ex-Governor Henderson, who has for a number of years past been the president. Under her judicious guidance the diocesan "Auxiliary" has secured an independence of action which has won the enthusiastic support of the women of the State.

As Mrs. Henderson positively refused to accept a re-election, Mrs. D. E. Wilson, of Woodward, Ala., a member of St. Andrew's Church, Birmingham, was elected to be her successor. Under the constitution all other officers of the diocesan "Auxiliary" are appointed by the president.

Meeting of National Guild of St. Barnabas.

The annual meeting of the National Guild of the Nurses of St. Barnabas was held in Grace Church, Orange, November 2 and 3, with a very large attendance of representatives from many parts of the country. The Rev. Dr. Mann preached the sermon at the opening service to a church full of nurses and their friends, with both of the Bishops and many of the clergy present. At the business session fourteen of the branches which are established throughout the country were represented. Bishop Stearly was elected chaplain general to the Guild. There is a membership of over 2,200 nurses now, and apparently the Guild is entering upon a period of large growth. Various reports concerning the work were received and acted upon, the officers were re-elected, and Hartford was chosen for the meeting of the next annual convention.

The Newark Diocesan Journal, the last work of the Rev. John Keller as secretary, has been published. There are now in the Diocese, which includes the northern third of New Jersey, 180 clergy, with 143 parishes and missions. The baptisms last year were 2,726, the confirmations 2,034. The Sunday school officers and teachers number 2,129 ,the scholars 17,803, and the communicants 43,450. The current expenses of the parishes and missions were $645,000, the receipts from all sources were $1,500,000, an increase over the preceding year of $430,000.

ALBANY

Rt. Rev. R. H. Nelson, D. D., Bishop.

Trinity Church, Sharon Springs, N. Y. the Rev. W. E. Daw, rector), has received another gift of $1,000 from Mrs. Mary E. Gardner to be added to the $2,000 already given by her as a memorial endowment in memory of her son, the endowment being known as the Lieutenant Gardner Memorial Fund, the interest to be used for the maintenance of services in Trinity Church and the fund to be added to from time to time.

WEST TEXAS

Rt. Rev. Wm. T. Capers, D. D., Bishop.

San Antonio Deanery Holds Interesting Meeting.

The Convocation of the San Antonio Deanery met at St. Mark's Church, San Antonio, on October 26-27. The Rev. A. J. Gayner Banks, as dean of the Convocation, presided over its sessions. The following subjects were most helpfully discussed: The Importance of Worthily Celebrating the Centennial of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, The Nation-Wide Campaign, Recruiting for Service, The Opportunity of the Church in the Diocese of West Texas, The Goal for the Diocese of West Texas, The Relation of the Church to the International Conference on Disarmament.

The Convocation was well attended. The Bishop of the Diocese and Bishop Johnston were present and took part in the discussions. The spirit of the Convocation was that of a set determination to support the Nation-Wide Campaign with devoted loyalty, and to make the very highest use of the Centennial of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society. At the close of the conference the Rev. S. Arthur Huston, rector of St. Mark's Church, San Antonio, presented resolutions, which were unanimously adopted, calling upon the people to remember before Almighty God, both in their public and private devotions, the coming conference and the individual members thereof, and to urge through every possible means, upon the delegates of the United States to the said conference, that the opportunity for leadership which has, under God, been committed to this country as a solemn trust, demands that the United States of America point the way from a narrow nationalism toward that mutual trust and confidence in the peoples of the earth, without which wars are inevitable and treaties are in vain.

A copy of these resolutions were sent to the President of the United States and to the Senators of the United States from the State of Texas and to the member of the House of Representatives from this congressional district, and to the press.

Indian Mission Pageant.

On Sunday, October 30, at Victoria, there was given an Indian Mission pageant, which had been prepared by the Rev. D. A. Sanford, now serving at this parish, and formerly a missionary among Indians. By him the choir was taught to sing portions of hymns in the Sioux and Chippewa Indian languages. This pageant set forth the present prosperous conditions of Indian Missions, in contrast with the uncivilized conditions of former days. By charts and banners such scenes as the Minnesota Massacre of 1862 and the Custer Massacre of 1876 made a dark background to the bright picture of thirty Indian clergy and five thousand communicants of the church among those same Sioux Indians.
